

Information Sheet Acceptable Use of Electronic Resources.

Access to licensed electronic resources such as electronic journals and other digital resources are governed by the conditions of use contained in license agreements between University and the respective publishers. These licenses vary but have some common elements, including provisions for preventing the excessive downloading of files.

Systematic downloading, distributing, or retaining substantial portions of information is usually prohibited under most contracts with the publishers of electronic resources. Library users are permitted to download an individual document temporarily to their own hard disc for non-commercial purposes or view multiple articles from an issue of a journal on screen. Documents may be printed out, but must not be forwarded digitally. In almost all cases it is prohibited to download entire databases or systematically download an entire journal issue. Systematic downloading using robots or spiders is universally unacceptable.

Publishers keep track of patterns of use and where the publishers suspect misuse in the form of systematic downloading they will cut off access by blocking particular IP addresses. To allow off-campus access to electronic resources UTAS uses proxy servers to send requests to publisher's sites for electronic resources. When a publisher blocks one of our proxy servers they effectively cut-off access to the resource for ALL library users until the Library has investigated the cause of the block, and taken steps to ensure it is not repeated.

Whilst the Library encourages UTAS staff and students to take advantage of the many scholarly electronic resources for which we have licences, remember that there should be only moderate downloading of information to avoid UTAS being suspected of inappropriate use of the resources. Unfortunately we cannot give you rigid guidelines, because there are so many licences, and they have different wording in each one. It is quite acceptable to use the resources to download "reasonable" amounts of data, to print and save materials for personal use; downloading whole volumes is not "fair use". Think of the sorts of restrictions on copying print journals under copyright law and use these as guidelines when using electronic resources, and you should not contravene our licence agreements.
