

Submission and Publication Agreement University of Tasmania Law Review

Introduction

This Submission and Publication Agreement outlines the terms and conditions under which you, the author (or co-author), agree to allow the University of Tasmania Law Review to reproduce the manuscript submitted by you and to permit third parties the right to do so. Manuscripts will not be considered for publication until a signed copy of this Agreement has been received.

1. Authorship

The University of Tasmania Law Review practices under the assumption that all submitted works are by original author(s) who own the copyright of the manuscript and that the manuscript has not previously been published or submitted for consideration elsewhere. In signing this Agreement you, the author (or co-author), affirm that:

- The article is an original work created by you and does not violate any copyright agreement;
- All material referenced by you and not created by you is attributed to appropriate authors;
- No substantial section of the manuscript has previously been published;
- The manuscript will not be submitted elsewhere unless and until the Editors of the University of Tasmania Law Review confirm in writing that they have no intention of publishing the manuscript;
- The manuscript is in no way defamatory and does not infringe the rights of any third party.

If any of the above affirmations are breached, you, the author (or co-author), agree to indemnify the University of Tasmania Law Review and its Editors for any loss, damage or any other liabilities that may occur as a result.

2. Copyright and further publication by author

Copyright of the article remains with you, the author (or co-author). You, the author (or co-author), permit the University of Tasmania Law Review to publish your article and to grant third parties the right to do so on the terms and conditions stated below.

While copyright of the manuscript remains with you, the author (or co-author), any further publication by you of the manuscript after the initial publication in the University of Tasmania Law Review requires permission from the Editors. You are permitted to make additional copies of the published version of your article but they must be distributed at or below cost. You are permitted to make a copy of the article available on your personal server or webpage and put a copy into your institution's research publications archive or database, provided full details of publication in the University of Tasmania Law Review are given.

3. Manuscript review

You, the author (or co-author), agree that the Editors' decision to publish your manuscript in the University of Tasmania Law Review is final. Communications from the Editors during the application review are not to be taken as confirmation that they have accepted your manuscript for publication. The application process may be slowed by the sending of manuscripts to external reviewers and any delay should not be treated as non-acceptance of the manuscript. The Editors retain the right to edit your manuscript to correct any spelling or syntax errors, to conform to requirements of house style and on occasion to enhance expressions or clarify meaning. In signing this Agreement, you authorise the Editors to do so without obtaining prior approval. The Editors will, however, normally consult the author(s) prior to making any major changes.

4. Reproduction

In addition to publishing the manuscript in printed format, the University of Tasmania Law Review may maximize any available commercial opportunities by publishing in a variety of other formats which may include: the Internet, CDs, online databases operated by third parties, for example Lexis/Nexis or HeinOnline, and any future technology. In signing this Agreement you authorise the University of Tasmania Law Review and therefore third parties to publish your manuscript in any of these formats as the Editors deem appropriate without any remuneration to the author.

I (we) agree to the terms outlined in this Agreement.*
