

TASMANIA
LAW REFORM
INSTITUTE

Warnings in sexual offences cases relating to delay in complaint

FINAL REPORT NO 8

OCTOBER 2006

CONTENTS

| | |
|---|-----------|
| Information on the Tasmania Law Reform Institute | ii |
| Acknowledgements | ii |
| Background to this Report..... | ii |
| List of Recommendations..... | iv |
| Part 1: The Current Law..... | 1 |
| Introduction | 1 |
| Longman Warning..... | 5 |
| Crofts Warning | 7 |
| Part 2: The Need for Reform..... | 9 |
| Complexity and Confusing Nature of the Warnings | 9 |
| Longman Warning..... | 9 |
| Crofts Warning | 11 |
| When are the Longman and Crofts Warnings Required? | 13 |
| The Crofts and Longman Warnings Resurrect Outmoded Views about the Reliability of Sexual Offences Complainants | 17 |
| Longman Warning as an Irrebuttable Presumption of Law | 18 |
| Submissions..... | 19 |
| Part 3: Options for Reform..... | 21 |
| Repeal of s 165(5)? | 21 |
| Submissions..... | 23 |
| Recommendations | 24 |
| Longman Warning..... | 24 |
| Submissions..... | 25 |
| Recommendations | 26 |
| Views of the Australian and Victorian Law Reform Commissions..... | 26 |
| Views of the Institute | 27 |
| Forensic Disadvantage | 28 |
| Conclusion..... | 29 |
| Crofts Warning | 30 |
| Submissions..... | 32 |
| Recommendations | 32 |
| Views of the Australian, New South Wales and Victorian Law Reform Commissions | 33 |
| Views of the Institute | 33 |

Information on the Tasmania Law Reform Institute

The Tasmania Law Reform Institute was established on 23 July 2001 by agreement between the Government of the State of Tasmania, the University of Tasmania and The Law Society of Tasmania. The creation of the Institute was part of a Partnership Agreement between the University and the State Government signed in 2000.

The Institute is based at the Sandy Bay campus of the University of Tasmania within the Law Faculty. The Institute undertakes law reform work and research on topics proposed by the Government, the community, the University and the Institute itself.

The Institute's Director is Professor Kate Warner of the University of Tasmania. The members of the Board of the Institute are Professor Kate Warner (Chair), Professor Don Chalmers (Dean of the Faculty of Law at the University of Tasmania), The Honourable Justice AM Blow OAM (appointed by the Honourable Chief Justice of Tasmania), Ms Lisa Hutton (appointed by the Attorney-General), Mr Philip Jackson (appointed by the Law Society), Ms Terese Henning (appointed by the Council of the University), Mr Mathew Wilkins (nominated by the Tasmanian Bar Association) and Ms Kate McQueeney, (nominated by the Women Lawyers Association).

To find out more about the Institute or obtain further copies of this report please visit our website: www.law.utas.edu.au/reform

Acknowledgements

This paper was prepared by Mr Victor Stojcevski and Ms Terese Henning. The Institute would like to acknowledge and thank Clare Hemming for her research assistance, Mr Bruce Newey for assistance in the preparation of this report, and the Director, Professor Kate Warner for her advice and assistance.

Background to this Report

The publication of this final report follows a consultation process that involved inviting and considering responses from interested parties and stakeholders within the criminal justice system. The consultation was facilitated by the release of an issues paper on this topic in June 2005. The issues paper discussed:

Part 1 – the current statutory law and common law with respect to warnings in sexual offences cases relating to delay in complaint;

Part 2 – the limitations of the current law and the need for reform; and

Part 3 – some options for reforming the law in relation to the warnings and directions given to juries relating to delay in complaint in sexual offences cases.

The following people responded to the issues paper:

- | | |
|--------------------------------|---------------------------------|
| 1. The Hon Mr Justice Crawford | Supreme Court Judge |
| 2. Mr Tim Ellis SC | Director of Public Prosecutions |
| 3. Mr Michael Daly | Barrister |
| 4. Mr Scott Tilyard | Tasmania Police |
| 5. Ms Wanda Buza | Women Tasmania |
| 6. Ms Nanette Rogers | |

In developing its recommendations the Tasmania Law Reform Institute has given detailed consideration to all the responses it received on this matter.

We thank those people for taking the time and effort to respond.

This report is available on the Institute's web page at: www.law.utas.edu.au/reform or can be sent to you by mail or email.

Address:
Tasmanian Law Reform Institute
Private Bag 89
Hobart TAS 7001

Inquiries should be directed to Rebecca Bradfield, on the above contacts, or by telephoning (03) 62262069 or email law.reform@utas.edu.au.

List of recommendations

1. That section 165(5) of the Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) be repealed.
2. The Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) should be amended to include provisions dealing with warnings and explanations in relation to forensic disadvantage incurred by an accused due to delay in the reporting of an offence. These provisions should:
 - require that where there has been a significant delay between the time at which an offence is alleged to have occurred and the reporting of that offence, and the accused requests that a warning be given, a warning may only be given where specific evidence is identified that demonstrates that s/he has suffered an identifiable forensic disadvantage as a result of the delay;
 - stipulate that identifiable forensic disadvantage is not established by the mere fact of delay alone;
 - make it clear that any warning given is to be given in accordance with s 165(2) and that it must not be couched in the particular terms laid down by the High Court in Longman, Crampton and Doggett;
 - specify that the warning is not to be couched in terms of its being ‘dangerous or unsafe to convict’;
 - also provide that where no specific evidence of an identifiable forensic disadvantage resulting from delay is identified and the accused requests that a warning be given, the trial judge may explain to the jury what the implications of the delay in complaint are for the accused;
 - make it clear that any such explanation is not to be couched as a warning in Longman terms, including not being couched in terms of its being ‘dangerous or unsafe to convict’; and
 - stipulate that the trial judge may refuse to give a warning or explanation if there are good reasons for doing so.
3. The Criminal Code (Tas) should be amended to include a provision that prohibits expressly trial judges from giving a Crofts direction.

Part 1

The Current Law

1.1 Introduction

1.1.1 In all trials, judges are required to direct juries in relation to applying the relevant law. They are also required to comment on or warn juries about the reliability of certain types of evidence where the accumulated experience of courts has provided knowledge about its reliability beyond that expected of the average juror. Historically, the common law viewed complainants in sexual offences cases as a class of inherently unreliable witness, predisposed to fabricate accusations of sexual assault and tending to fantasise about sexual experiences. This perception was used to justify the requirement that trial judges should warn juries that it would be unwise/dangerous to convict the accused in a sexual offences case on the uncorroborated evidence of the complainant. After lengthy debate informed by law reform reports and research that demonstrated the injustice attendant upon and the discriminatory nature of the common law approach, all Australian legislatures have enacted reforms removing mandatory corroboration requirements for the evidence of sexual assault complainants. In Tasmania these reforms are contained in s 136 of the Criminal Code (Tas) and s 164 Evidence Act 2001 (Tas). Section 164 is of general application – it abolishes all common law corroboration doctrines. It provides:

- (1) It is not necessary that evidence on which a party relies be corroborated.
- (2) Subsection (1) does not affect the operation of a rule of law that requires corroboration with respect to the offence of perjury or a similar or related offence.
- (3) Despite any rule, whether of law or practice, to the contrary, but subject to the other provisions of this Act, if there is a jury, it is not necessary that the judge:
 - (a) warn the jury that it is dangerous to act on uncorroborated evidence or give a warning to the same or similar effect; or
 - (b) give a direction relating to the absence of corroboration.

[Subsection (4) makes specific provision with respect to the evidence of children.]

Section 136 of the Code is of specific application, applying only in sexual offences trials. It provides:

- (1) At the trial of a person accused of a crime under chapter XIV or XX, no rule of law or practice shall require a judge to give a warning to the jury to the effect that it is unsafe to convict the person on the uncorroborated evidence of a person against whom the crime is alleged to have been committed.
- (2) A judge shall not give a warning of the kind referred to in subsection (1) unless satisfied that the warning is justified in the circumstances.¹

1.1.2 The common law also reflected judicial expectations about the way that genuine victims of sexual assault would behave. In particular, it was believed that a genuine victim would complain about the offence as soon as possible after it occurred. Such an expectation, in the common law view, accorded with common sense understandings of human behaviour. Absence of complaint or delay in making a complaint was, therefore, considered to impact unfavourably upon the credibility of the complainant's account and to suggest that the allegations made were fabricated. The leading Australian authority on this construction of a complainant's delay in complaining or failure to complain is the High Court decision in Kilby.² In that case it was held that trial judges should instruct juries that such delay reflected upon the credibility of the complainant's account and supplied an important factor in determining whether her or his allegations were fabricated (known as the Kilby direction).

¹ The crimes in Chapter XIV are 'crimes against morality' including, inter alia, incest, indecent assault, unlawful sexual intercourse with a young person. The crimes in Chapter XX are rape, abduction and stalking.

1.1.3 The dubious assumption that anyone who has been sexually assaulted will naturally make an early complaint takes little account of the possible circumstances involved in the offence – the nature of the assault, the relationship of the perpetrator to the complainant, any trauma resulting, and the complainant's age and her or his ability to relate what has occurred. Research has shown that delay in making a complaint is common among sexual assault victims and that many victims will make no complaint at all. For example, the Australian results from the 2000 International Crime and Victim Surveys (ICVS) showed a reporting rate of only 15% for sexual assaults and offensive sexual behaviour.³ The Australian Women's Safety Survey of 1996 also found a reporting rate of 15% for women who had been sexually assaulted in the 12 months prior to the survey.⁴ The same research indicates that there are powerful reasons that cause many to make no complaint. Social, emotional and economic pressures all influence complainants to suppress any impulse to recount their experience. A desire not to cause distress to family members, fears of being disbelieved, feelings of guilt and shame about the assault also militate against revelation. Additionally, victims' negative perceptions about the justice system's provision of redress may also result in non-reporting.⁵

The submission of Women Tasmania also points out that substantial delays in reporting may and often do occur in sexual assault cases involving child victims.⁶ Wanda Buza, the Director of Women Tasmania, states that incidents of sexual assault that may have occurred in a victim's childhood are increasingly being brought to trial when victims reach adulthood:

The most recent example of large scale delayed reporting of sexual assault crimes has been the investigation by the Tasmanian Ombudsman, which resulted in the report, Review of claims of abuse from adults in state care as children, 2004. This report revealed 192 allegations of sexual assault, 24% of the total of claims. A number of these were not reported at the time the assault took place, with those that were reported recorded on individual's files. The Ombudsman noted that in most cases it is recorded that no charges were laid as a result of the complaints at the time they were initially reported. At the time of the review eight cases, previously reported and dismissed, had been referred to police for prosecution.

1.1.4 The courts have, by and large, been slow to acknowledge the varying 'normal' responses of victims to sexual crimes. However, judicial critique of the common law approach is growing. For example, in the High Court case, Papakosmas McHugh J queried its validity:⁷

Whether the credibility reason for admitting complaint evidence remains, or ever was, valid may be doubted. In R v King [(1995) 78 A Crim R 53 at 54 (Queensland Court of Appeal)], Fitzgerald P pointed out, correctly in my opinion, that the admissibility of complaint evidence "is based on male assumptions, in earlier times, concerning the behaviour to be

² (1973) 129 CLR 460.

³ D Lievore, Non-Reporting and Hidden Recording of Sexual Assault in Australia, AIC, Canberra, 2002.

⁴ Australian Bureau of Statistics, Women's Safety Australia 1996 ABS, Canberra, 1996. For further examples, see Law Reform Commission of Victoria, Rape: Reform of the Law of Procedure Appendices to Interim report No 42, 1991; Heroines of Fortitude: The Experiences of Women in Court as Victims of Sexual Assault, Gender Bias and the Law Project, Dept of Women, New South Wales Government, November 1996; A Neame & M Heenan What lies behind the hidden figure of sexual assault? Briefing No. 1 Australian Institute of Family Studies, September 2003; D Lievore, Non-Reporting and Hidden Recording of Sexual Assault: An International Literature Review, Commonwealth Office of the Status of Women, Canberra, 2003.

⁵ D Lievore, above n 3.

⁶ See Task Force on Sexual Assault and Rape in Tasmania, Report of the Task Force on Sexual Assault and Rape in Tasmania, 1998.

⁷ (1999) 196 CLR 298. See also, M (1994) 181 CLR 487, 514 per Gaudron J on the unsuitability of the doctrine in respect of child complainants; Jones (1997) 191 CLR 439 at 463 per Kirby J; Suresh v R (1998) 72 ALJR 769, 778 per Kirby J and R v King (1995) 78 A Crim R 53, 54 per Fitzgerald P.

expected of a female who is raped, although human behaviour following such a traumatic experience seems likely to be influenced by a variety of factors, and vary accordingly”.

1.1.5 In LTP Howie J stated:⁸

I do not understand how any inference can legitimately be drawn about the veracity of a young child from the fact that the child does not complain about sexual misconduct at the first reasonable opportunity especially where the conduct is perpetrated by a close family member. Certainly courts should not be encouraging such a line of reasoning on the basis of some supposed collective experience or understanding of the behaviour of children in such a situation ...

1.1.6 Legislatures have been quicker in recognising and attempting to remedy the deficiencies of the common law and, as a result, many jurisdictions including Tasmania, have enacted legislation requiring trial judges to inform juries that delay in or failure to complain is not necessarily indicative of fabrication. These provisions also require trial judges to advise juries about the possible explanations for a complainant’s failure to make a timely complaint. The relevant statutory provision in Tasmania is s 371A Criminal Code (Tas), (enacted in 1987). It provides:

Where, during the trial of a person accused of a crime under chapters XIV or XX, there is evidence which tends to suggest an absence of complaint by the person upon whom the crime is alleged to have been committed or which tends to suggest delay by that person in making a complaint, the judge shall –

- (a) give a warning to the jury that absence of complaint or delay in complaining does not necessarily indicate that the allegation that the crime was committed is false; and
- (b) inform the jury that there may be good reasons why such a person may hesitate in making, or may refrain from making, a complaint.

1.1.7 This reform and the reforms relating to corroboration were designed not only to eliminate unwarranted misconceptions about the unreliability of the evidence of sexual assault complainants but also to achieve a balance of fairness in the criminal justice process for the accused and for complainants. The 1982 Tasmanian Law Reform Commission Report on Rape and Sexual Offences which recommended the reform contained in s 371A Criminal Code (Tas) also suggested that the warning would help to counteract smear tactics by defence counsel based on the complainant’s delay in complaining and would assist the jury in gaining an understanding of the complainant’s position.⁹

1.1.8 However, the effectiveness of these reforms has been eroded by subsequent judicial interpretation and developments in the common law. While s 136 of the Criminal Code (Tas) and s 164 of the Evidence Act have abolished the requirements for corroboration in common law terms, they do not prohibit judges giving a corroboration warning in relation to the complainant’s allegations in particular cases where they believe it is appropriate, in the interests of ensuring a fair trial for the accused, to do so. Similarly, s 371A Criminal Code (Tas) does not prevent a trial judge from giving a Kilby warning. Further, sections 371A and 136 Criminal Code (Tas) and section 164 Evidence Act (Tas) should be read with s 165 of the Evidence Act (Tas) which requires a trial judge to give a warning to the jury on the request of a party about the unreliability of particular evidence. It provides:

- (1) This section applies to evidence of a kind that may be unreliable, including the following kinds of evidence:
 - (a) evidence in relation to which Part 2 of Chapter 3 or Part 4 of Chapter 3 applies;
 - (b) identification evidence;

⁸ [2004] NSWCCA 109.

⁹ Law Reform Commission (Tasmania), Report and Recommendations on Rape and Sexual Offences, Report No 31, 1982, 26.

Warnings in Sexual Offences Cases

- (c) evidence the reliability of which may be affected by age, ill health, whether physical or mental, injury or the like;
 - (d) evidence given in a criminal proceeding by a witness who may reasonably be supposed to be criminally concerned in the events giving rise to the proceedings;
 - (e) evidence given in a criminal proceeding by a witness who is a prison informer;
 - (f) oral evidence of official questioning of a defendant that is questioning recorded in writing that has not been signed or otherwise acknowledged by the defendant;
 - (g) in a proceeding against the estate of a deceased person, evidence adduced by or on behalf of a person seeking relief in the proceeding that is evidence about a matter about which the deceased person could have given evidence if he or she were alive.
- (2) If there is a jury and a party so requests, the judge is to –
- (a) warn the jury that the evidence may be unreliable; and
 - (b) inform the jury of the matters that may cause it to be unreliable;
 - (c) warn the jury of the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it.
- (3) The judge need not comply with subsection (2) if there are good reasons for not doing so.
- (4) it is not necessary that a particular form of words be used in giving the warning or information.
- (5) This section does not affect any other power of the judge to give a warning to, or inform, the jury.

Section 165(5) expressly retains the power of a trial judge to give common law directions and warnings. Despite the legislative reform of the common law corroboration doctrines and of the law relating to early complaint, the High Court has developed new corroboration requirements and imposed new mandatory directions upon trial judges relating to delay in complaint that potentially reinstate, albeit in a mutated form, traditional suspicions and beliefs about sexual assault complainants. These directions apply in Tasmanian sexual offences trials by virtue of s 165(5) Evidence Act 2001 (Tas).

The main common law directions/warnings to be given in sexual offences trials fall into two distinct categories:

1. The Longman warning which directs the jury as to the dangers of convicting on the complainant's evidence alone and which is to be given 'whenever necessary to avoid a perceptible risk of miscarriage of justice arising from the circumstances of the case';¹⁰ and
2. The Crofts direction which requires the trial judge to give a 'balancing direction' to the direction required by such provisions as s 371A Criminal Code (Tas) and to inform the jury that delay in complaining may affect the credibility of the complainant's account.

¹⁰ R v Longman (1989) 168 CLR 79, 91 per Brennan, Dawson and Toohey JJ.

1.2 Longman Warning¹¹

1.2.1 In Longman,¹² the accused was charged with sexual assault of his step daughter. The offences allegedly occurred over 20 years prior to the complainant making any complaint about them. The High Court held that substantial delay between offence and complaint (and therefore prosecution) disadvantaged the accused in mounting a defence and consequently required the trial judge to warn the jury about the dangers of convicting him on the complainant's uncorroborated evidence. McHugh J held that the disadvantage to the accused was constituted by difficulties he would have in marshalling witnesses and by the inevitable lack of detail in the evidence arising from such delayed accusations.

1.2.2 Brennan, Dawson and Toohey JJ explained the problems arising for the accused from the delayed complaint and prosecution as follows:¹³

Had the allegations been made soon after the alleged event, it would have been possible to explore in detail the alleged circumstances attendant upon its occurrence and perhaps to adduce evidence throwing doubt upon the complainant's story or confirming the applicant's denial ... The jury should have been told that, as the evidence of the complainant could not be adequately tested after the passage of more than twenty years, it would be dangerous to convict on that evidence alone, unless the jury, scrutinizing the evidence with great care, considering the circumstances relevant to its evaluation and paying heed to the warning, were satisfied of its truth and accuracy.

1.2.3 The approach of the High Court in Longman has been entrenched in two succeeding High Court cases, *Crampton*¹⁴ and Doggett.¹⁵ In the New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal case, BWT,¹⁶ Sully J stated that the High Court's position since these cases is that in any sexual offences trial where there is evidence of substantial delay in complaint, a Longman warning must be given and it must be cast in a form that plainly manifests certain characteristics. His Honour then detailed the principles in this regard that can be extracted from these cases (what follows paraphrases his Honour's points):

(a) The direction must be cast in the form of a warning. If what is said is cast as a comment, or even a caution it will not sufficiently comply with the High Court requirements.

(b) The warning must be framed to ensure that it covers the following propositions: first, that because of the passage of time the evidence of the complainant cannot be adequately tested; secondly, that it would be, therefore, dangerous to convict on that evidence alone; thirdly, that the jury is entitled, nevertheless, to act upon that evidence alone if satisfied of its truth and accuracy; fourthly, that the jury cannot be so satisfied without having first scrutinised the evidence with great care; fifthly, that the carrying out of that scrutiny must take into careful account any circumstances which are peculiar to the particular case and which have a logical bearing upon the truth and accuracy of the complainant's evidence; and sixthly, that every stage of the carrying out of that scrutiny of the complainant's evidence must take serious account of the warning as to the dangers of conviction.

(c) The warning must unmistakably bear the imprint of the Court's own authority and it must be made clear that the basis for warning is the accumulated experience of the Courts in dealing with cases involving delayed complaint. It is unwise to suggest that the warning is simply a reflection of what the jurors' common sense would in any event have indicated.

(d) Additional considerations to which Deane J and McHugh J referred must be also kept in mind when framing the warning (see para 2.2.22).

¹¹ See generally, J Hunter, C Cameron and T Henning, Litigation II: Evidence and Criminal Procedure, (2005) LexisNexis Butterworths, Sydney, 1187 – 1198.

¹² (1989) 168 CLR 79.

¹³ R v Longman (1989) 168 CLR 79, 87.

¹⁴ (2000) 206 CLR 161.

¹⁵ (2001) 208 CLR 343.

¹⁶ (2002) 54 NSWLR 241.

(e) The framing of a satisfactory Longman direction will be a much more difficult task where there is corroboration for the complainant's evidence. This is because, in such a case, as was pointed out by Gleeson CJ in Doggett at [9], the warning, to be of practical assistance to the jury, requires the trial judge to go into the matter of corroboration, to direct the attention of the jury to the evidence capable of being regarded as corroborative and to explain its possible significance. This may be, in fact inimical to the defence case, because often as far as the accused is concerned, the less said about corroboration the better.

While the majority of the High Court has not said that a Longman direction will always be required notwithstanding that there is evidence capable of corroborating the complainant's evidence, their Honours do make plain that the availability of such corroborative evidence cannot, of itself, obviate the need for a proper Longman direction. Their Honours appear to have said that the availability of such corroborative evidence will require the trial Judge to make a painstaking analysis of the way in which, the extent to which, and of the particular points in connection with which, the corroborative material is effective; and then to decide whether the resulting state of affairs leaves open, notwithstanding the corroboration, such forensic disadvantage as to call for the giving of a Longman direction.

(f) The initial trigger for any Longman direction is the passage of time between the alleged offence and first complaint. What is not clear is whether there is any, and if so what, time lapse that would be generally regarded by current majority opinion in the High Court as not calling for the giving of a Longman direction, so it would be prudent for a trial Judge to regard any delay between offence and complaint as sufficient to raise for consideration the need for a Longman direction.

1.2.4 Sully J's judgment indicates that the Longman warning has three components:

- the warning (it is dangerous to convict);
- the reasons for the warning (because the accused has been prejudiced by delay); and
- the response to the warning (to carefully scrutinise the evidence before convicting upon it).¹⁷

His Honour also provided guidance in framing the Longman warning and the wording to be used (see also Buddin J in *GS*¹⁸). His Honour suggested that a trial judge who is framing a Longman direction must ensure that the final form of the direction to the jury covers the following propositions:

- (i) That because of the passage of time the evidence of the complainant cannot be adequately tested;
- (ii) That it would be, therefore, dangerous to convict on that evidence alone;
- (iii) That the jury is entitled, nevertheless, to act upon that evidence alone if satisfied of its truth and accuracy;
- (iv) That the jury cannot be so satisfied without having first scrutinised the evidence with great care;
- (v) That the carrying out of that scrutiny must take into careful account any circumstances which are peculiar to the particular case and which have a logical bearing upon the truth and accuracy of the complainant's evidence; and
- (vi) That every stage of the carrying out of that scrutiny of the complainant's evidence must take serious account of the warning as to the dangers of conviction.

1.2.5 It is apparent from Crampton and Doggett and from Sully J's judgment in BWT that the requirement to give a Longman warning operates akin to a rule of law whenever there is substantial delay in complaint. A strong prosecution case and the existence of corroborative evidence for the ¹⁷ R v MM (2003) 145 A Crim R 148 per Howie J.

¹⁸ [2003] NSWCCA 73.

complainant's account do not relieve the trial judge of the necessity of giving the warning: Doggett per Gaudron, Callinan and Kirby JJ. Appeal Courts have focused particularly on the adequacy of trial judges' directions. The direction must be in the form of a warning. If what is said is couched as a comment only or a caution it will be insufficient.¹⁹ Additionally, the warning must be in the terms and cover the matters prescribed by the High Court decisions in Longman, Crampton and Doggett.²⁰

1.2.6 Departure from the terms of the warning devised by the High Court will provide fertile grounds for appeal. Nevertheless, it has been held that no specific form of words is required in giving the Longman direction so long as the essential purpose of the direction is performed and the substance of the principles in Longman accorded with.²¹

1.3 Crofts Warning²²

1.3.1 In Crofts,²³ the High Court considered the effect of the Victorian equivalent of s 371A of the Criminal Code (Tas)²⁴ and concluded that it did not, as a matter of law, prohibit the trial judge from giving a Kilby direction. The High Court went further and held that in appropriate cases a judge is required to instruct the jury to the effect that failure to make an early complaint might indicate that the complainant has fabricated her or his in-court allegations. According to the High Court the purpose of provisions like s 371A is to remediate the balance of jury instruction, not to remove it. The court held:²⁵

... the intention of the legislature was not to "sterilise" complainants from critical comment where the particular facts of the case, and the justice of the circumstances, suggested that the judge should put such comments before the jury for their consideration.

Toohy, Gaudron, Gummow and Kirby JJ emphasised the use of the word 'necessarily' in the Victorian provision, which is also used in the Tasmanian provision, in deciding that the Kilby direction should still be given.²⁶

[I]n the particular circumstances ... the delay may be so long, so inexplicable, or so unexplained, that the jury could properly take it into account in concluding that ... the allegation was false.

1.3.2 In Crofts, the delay in complaining was six months after the last alleged assault, but six years from the first. The majority of the court held that the requirements of fairness to the accused dictated that the jury be instructed as to the 'legal significance of the absence of complaint soon after the alleged incidents'. Failure to give a Kilby direction, the High Court found, justified quashing the convictions. Such failure was also said to create the risk that provisions like section 371A Criminal Code (Tas) might wrongly be interpreted as converting sexual assault complainants into an 'especially trustworthy class of witnesses'. The High Court accepted two qualifications to the duty to provide the Kilby direction. The first is where the peculiar facts of the case and the conduct of the trial do not suggest the need for a warning to restore a balance of fairness. No indication was given of the type of case that might meet this qualification, and given the apparent ordinariness of the cases where the direction has been held to be necessary 'to ensure that the accused secures a fair trial', it is difficult to ¹⁹ GS [2003] NSWCCA 73, per Buddin J, Santow J and Smart JA agreeing.

²⁰ BWT (2002) 54 NSWLR 241 per Sully J, Wood CJ at CL, Dowd J agreeing.

²¹ Kesisyan [2003] NSWCCA 259 per Meagher JA and Sully J, Kirby J agreeing.

²² See generally, J Hunter, C Cameron and T Henning, above n 11, 1198 – 1210.

²³ (1996) 186 CLR 427.

²⁴ Section 61(1)(b) Crimes Act 1958 (Vic).

²⁵ Crofts (1996) CLR 427, 451.

²⁶ Ibid, 451.

envisage a case of delayed complaint where a warning in the required terms might not be given. In fact, current authority suggests that the Kilby direction should be given ‘as a general rule’.²⁷

1.3.3 The second qualification to the duty to caution is that the warning should not be expressed in such terms as to undermine the purpose of the mandatory statutory directions by suggesting a stereotyped view that complainants in sexual assault cases are unreliable or that delay in making a complaint about an alleged sexual offence is invariably a sign that the complainant’s evidence is false. How this is reasonably to be achieved remains a mystery.

1.3.4 In summary, Crofts establishes that a trial judge has a discretion in individual cases to invite the jury to use lack of recent complaint to impugn the complainant’s credibility. The underlying principles of a fair trial and the overriding duty of a trial judge to ensure that the accused secures a fair trial mean that the trial judge may, and in appropriate cases must, give a ‘balancing direction’ to the mandated s 371A directions to the effect that failure to complain or delay in complaint may be taken into account in the assessment of the complainant’s credibility.

²⁷ See comments to this effect in Markuleski (2001) 52 NSWLR 82 per Spigelman CJ, Carruthers AJ agreeing, and per Wood CJ at CL.

Part 2

The Need for Reform

2.1.1 The Longman and Crofts warnings give rise to a number of practical, procedural and theoretical problems. Specifically, they introduce uncertainty into the law because it is unclear in many cases whether either or both of these warnings should be given; the warnings require complex, possibly confusing and even contradictory directions to be given to the jury; they potentially re-instate and endorse false stereotypes of sexual assault complainants and, therefore, also raise the spectre of injustice and unjustified discrimination in the criminal justice process for such complainants. Furthermore, they undermine legislative reforms to the common law designed to overcome this injustice and discrimination. The Longman warning is also problematic because it has developed through case law so that now it creates an irrebuttable presumption that the accused has been prejudiced in his defence by the length of delay between the commission of the alleged offence and its reporting. This presumption continues to apply and requires a warning even in cases where there is no evidence that the accused has actually been prejudiced in this way. Further, this warning is open to misinterpretation by the jury as a coded direction from the judge to acquit the accused.

2.2 Complexity and Confusing Nature of the Warnings²⁸

Longman warning

2.2.1 The complexity of the Longman warning, particularly where there is actually some corroboration of the complainant's account, is demonstrated and explained in the judgment of Sully J in BWT. Its complexity coupled with the necessity to give an adequate warning in the terms mandated by the High Court pose difficulties for trial judges in giving directions that are insulated against successful appeal and that also meet the coexisting requirement of intelligibility, simplicity and brevity. The number of successful appeals on the ground of failure to give an adequate warning provides eloquent testament to this problem, see for example:

| | | |
|---------------------------------------|-------------------------------------|------------------------------------|
| Allegretta [2003] WASCA 17 | GJH [2001] NSWCCA 128 | MWR [2003] WASCA 236 |
| Aristidis [1999] 2 Qd R 629 | GPP [2001] NSWCCA 493 | Newhouse [2001] NSWCCA 294 |
| Arundell [1999] 2 VR 228 | Green (2001) 78 SASR 463 | NJB [2004] VSCA 168 |
| Ball [2001] NSWCCA 352 | Greenhalgh [2001] NSWCCA 437 | Percival [2003] NSWCCA 409 |
| BFB [2003] SASC 411 | GS [2003] NSWCCA 73 | Petty (1994) 13 WAR 372 |
| BKK [2001] NSWCCA 525 | H [2002] NSWCCA 355 | Power [2003] SASC 77 |
| Buckley [2004] VSCA 185 | Henman [2001] NSWCCA 4 | Roberts (2001) 53 NSWLR 138 |
| BWT (2002) 54 NSWLR 241 | HS [2004] SASC 300 | Roddam [2001] NSWCCA 168 |
| Channell [2002] NSWCCA 187 | Hyatt (1998) 101 A Crim R 83 | RWB [2003] SASC 420 |
| Christophers (2000) 23 WAR 106 | JBV [2002] NSWCCA 212 | Salater [2001] VSCA 128 |
| Cook (2000) 22 WAR 67 | Johnston (1998) 45 NSWLR 362 | Scott [2004] NSWCCA 254 |
| Corrigan (1998) 74 SASR 454 | K (1997) 68 SASR 405 | SJB [2002] NSWCCA 163 |
| Crisafio [2003] WASCA 104 | Kailis (1999) 21 WAR 100 | Sy [2004] NSWCCA 297 |
| Dawe [2001] WASCA 306 | Lewis [2003] NSWCCA 180 | T (1999) 74 SASR 486 |
| DBG [2002] NSWCCA 328 | Liddy (2002) 81 SASR 22 | TWK [2003] VSCA 225 |
| Eyles [2002] NSWCCA 510 | Little [2001] NSWCCA 173 | Vonarx [1999] 3 VR 618 |
| Fitzsimmons [2001] NSWCCA 59 | Mayberry [2000] NSWCCA 531 | WEB [2003] VSCA 205 |
| Fuller [2001] NSWCCA 390 | Miletic [1997] 1 VR 593 | Westley [2004] NSWCCA 192 |
| Garlick [2003] NSWCCA 398 | Murphy [2000] NSWCCA 297 | WRC [2002] NSWCCA 210 |
| GEA [2002] NSWCCA 222 | Murray [2001] NSWCCA 289 | Young [1998] 1 VR 402 |
| GEC (2001) 3 VR 334 | Murre [2001] NSWCCA 286 | |
| Gee [2003] WASCA 178 | MWL [2002] VSCA 221 | |

This does not pretend to be a comprehensive list.²⁹

²⁸ See generally, J Hunter, C Cameron and T Henning, above n 11, 1198 – 1210.

The prominence of appeals based on alleged defects in trial judges' warnings to juries in sexual offences cases has also been revealed by recent research³⁰ in New South Wales which found that 26.7% of all cases before the New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal in 2004 (n = 475) were appeals against conviction.³¹ The table below³² relates to these conviction appeals and shows that 28.3% involved sexual assault offences.

2004 NSW Court of Criminal Appeal: Conviction Appeals

| As % of all conviction appeals | |
|---|--------|
| Sexual assault offences | 28.3 % |
| Other violence against the person offences (for example, murder and assault offences) | 29.9 % |
| Property offences (for example larceny offences and armed robbery offences where no physical injury was charged) | 18.1 % |
| Drug offences | 19.7 % |
| Other offences (for example, insider trading and escape lawful custody offences) | 3.9 % |

However, of most significance for the present inquiry is the finding that in 55.5% of all of the appeals against conviction in sexual offences cases the grounds of appeal related to inadequate or defective warnings by trial judges. Wood CJ at CL and Sully J in BWT commented on the difficulties now facing trial judges in adequately warning juries. Sully J stated in an addendum to his judgment:³³

It seems to me, if I may say so with unfeigned respect, that the combined effect of the decisions in Longman, in Crampton and in Doggett makes it, if not quite impossible, at least extremely and unnecessarily difficult for a conscientious trial judge when directing a jury, to give dutiful effect, as of course he must do, to the requirements of those decisions, while simultaneously giving effect to the requirement that he be succinct, simple and clear.

Similarly, in Dyers Kirby J commented:³⁴

I sympathise with the difficulty that trial judges and courts of criminal appeal face in conforming to the various opinions stated in this court in relation to the Longman requirement. Different emphasis has been placed at different times by different members of this court upon different parts of the reasoning in Longman.

2.2.2 Even if the guidelines provided in cases like BWT are followed and a trial judge warns the jury in relation to delay, the warning may still lack the specificity required for an acceptable Longman warning. The successful appeal in *GJH*³⁵ demonstrates how exact the language used by trial judges must be. In that case Stein J stated, '[t]he trial judge did not express the matter of delay in terms of "dangerousness"...The summing up amounted to a comment that was comprehensive, but was not a warning of the unmistakable and firm kind that was needed in a case of such lengthy delay'.

2.2.3 Further, despite judicial guidance, there are conflicting views about the content, necessary strength and delivery of the warning. In some cases it has been held that, 'no specific words are ²⁹ See also the discussion of this issue by C R Williams, 'Warnings Occasioned by Delay in Paedophile Prosecutions' (2003) 27 CLJ 70.

³⁰ D Boniface, 'The Common Sense of Jurors vs The Wisdom of the Law: Judicial Directions and Warnings in Sexual Assault Trials' (2005) 28 UNSWLJ 261.

³¹ The majority of appeals (62.5%) were appeals against sentence: Boniface, ibid, 262.

³² This table is taken from Boniface, ibid.

³³ BWT (2002) 54 NSWLR 241, [114].

³⁴ (2002) 210 CLR 285, Kirby J at para 55.

³⁵ (2001) 122 A Crim R 361.

required in a Longman direction and as long as the essential purpose of the direction is performed, that is all the judge needs to do'.³⁶ For example, Callaway JA in *Glennon*³⁷ stated that, a Longman warning does not have to take any particular form. The critical question is whether the judge gave such directions as were necessary and practical, in the circumstances, to avoid a perceptible risk of miscarriage of justice arising from a factor that the jury required the judge's assistance to evaluate.

In contrast, in other cases, a strict adherence to the nominated requirements of the Longman direction has been required. For example, in SJB Levine J held:³⁸

The critical words 'dangerous to convict' which it is to be stressed, are contained in the Longman direction as originally formulated... must be used. They were not, there has been a miscarriage of justice, the conviction must be quashed.

2.2.4 The case law also reflects a level of confusion about the requirements of the warning. For example, in Fotou,³⁹ Charles JA rejected the applicant's third ground of appeal and found that while a Longman warning was required, the trial judge had adequately complied with its requirements by telling the jury that the central issue was the complainant's credibility, that her evidence must be scrutinised very carefully, that the jury should look for other supporting evidence, and that because she was young and intellectually disabled her evidence should be carefully examined.⁴⁰ This informal approach to the application and substance of the Longman warning can be contrasted with cases like JBV,⁴¹ where even though the trial judge's summing up was held to represent 'an earnest attempt to apply the majority reasoning in Longman', it was nevertheless held to be defective.

2.2.5 It is probably undesirable that a standardised Longman warning be developed. As Charles JA in *WEB*⁴² stated, 'I accept [counsel for the applicant's] argument that no particular form of words is required, in the sense that every warning must be appropriately tailored to the facts of the case concerned, and each warning is, in that respect unique'. A similar approach was taken by Miller J in *Gaulard*⁴³ who stated, 'I agree that the words used by the majority in Longman are not a formula which is to be parroted by a trial judge without reference to individual circumstances'. However, given the number of successful appeals where deviation from the perceived requirements of the Longman warning has occurred or where an aspect of the Longman warning regarded as critical by the appeal court has been omitted by the trial judge, the development of a standardised, ritualised warning may be inevitable. In fact, in R v LTP, Dunford J, with Simpson and Howie JJ agreeing, suggested that trial judges in sexual offences cases would be well advised to use the points set down by Wood CJ in BWT as a check list.⁴⁴

Crofts Warning

2.2.6 The Crofts warning is problematic because it produces apparently equivocating directions on the relevance of want of complaint for the complainant's credibility.⁴⁵ For example, in a trial where there is evidence of delay in making a complaint the trial judge may give two apparently contradictory warnings to the jury: the first mandated by s 371A of the Criminal Code (Tas) which requires a ³⁶ R v Kesisyany [2003] NSWCCA 259 per Meagher JA.

³⁷ (No 2) (2001) 7 VR 631.

³⁸ (2002) 129 A Crim R 54.

³⁹ Supreme Court, Victoria, Court of Appeal, Winneke P, Charles JA and Southwell AJA, 26 June 1996.

⁴⁰ 'Case and Comment – Fotou' (1997) 21 Crim LJ 46.

⁴¹ [2002] NSWCCA 212.

⁴² (2003) 7 VR 200.

⁴³ [2000] WASCA 218.

⁴⁴ [2004] NSWCCA 109, [47].

⁴⁵ On this point see in particular the comments of Simon Bronitt, 'The Rules of Recent Complaint: Rape Myths and the Legal Construction of the "Reasonable" Rape Victim' in Balancing the Scales: Rape Law Reform and Australian Culture, P Eastal (ed), Federation Press, (1998), 41.

warning that delayed complaint does not necessarily indicate that the complainant has fabricated her allegations; the second mandated by the decision in Crofts which requires the ‘balancing’ direction, that such delay may be indicative of fabrication. What is a jury to make of this? Logically, such directions, being contradictory as to the probative potential of the lack of complaint evidence, effectively rob it of any probative value and so render it irrelevant. In any event, the multiplicity of directions where a Longman direction is also given may result in jury overload and confusion.⁴⁶

2.2.7 The difficulties faced by trial judges in adequately warning juries, the complexity and length of the warnings to be given and the consequent confusion that may result for juries is increased by the number of warnings that may have to be given in sexual offences cases. In BWT,⁴⁷ Wood CJ at CL identified eight distinct categories of warning that may need to be given by the trial judge in a sexual assault case. These directions are in addition to the standard directions and warnings which must be given in every trial:⁴⁸

(a) the Murray direction (R v Murray (1987) 11 NSWLR 12) to the effect that where there is only one witness asserting the commission of a crime, the evidence of that witness ‘must be scrutinized with great care’ before a conclusion is arrived at that a verdict of guilty should be brought in.

(b) The Longman direction (as reinforced in Crampton and Doggett), that by reason of delay, it would be ‘unsafe or dangerous’ to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of the complainant alone, unless the jury scrutinizing the evidence with great care, considering the circumstances relevant to its evaluation and paying heed to the warning, were satisfied of its truth and accuracy.

(c) The Crofts direction (Crofts v R (1996) 186 CLR 427), if a jury is to be informed, in accordance with s 107 of the Criminal Procedure Act, [the New South Wales equivalent of s 371A Criminal Code (Tas)] that a delay in complaint does not necessarily indicate that the allegation is false, and that there may be good reasons why a victim of sexual assault may hesitate in complaining about it, then it should also be informed that the absence of a complaint or a delay in the making of it may be taken into account in evaluating the evidence of the complainant, and in determining whether to believe him or her (but not in terms reviving the stereotyped view that complainants in sexual assault cases are unreliable or that delay is invariably a sign of the falsity of the complaint: Crofts at 451).

(d) The KRM direction (KRM v R (2001) 75 ALJR 550) to the effect that, except where the evidence relating to one count charging sexual assault is admissible, in relation to another count or counts alleging a separate occasion of such an assault, the jury must consider each count separately, and only by reference to the evidence which applies to it; balancing that direction, where appropriate, by a reminder that if the jury has a reasonable doubt concerning the credibility of the complainant’s evidence on one or more counts, they can take that into account when assessing his or her reliability on the other counts (see R v Markuleski [2001] NSWCCA 290 at [259]–[263]).

(e) Any warning which may be required by reason of a ruling that limits the use of evidence concerning a complaint, or delay in complaint, to the question of credibility (eg under s 108(3) of the Evidence Act as an exception to the credibility rule), or alternatively that allows it to be taken into account (under s 66 of the Evidence Act as an exception to the hearsay rule) as evidence of the facts asserted.

(f) The Gipp warning (conveniently so called, although there was divided reasoning in Gipp v R (1998) 194 CLR 106) concerning the way in which evidence of uncharged sexual conduct between an accused and a complainant can be taken into account as showing the nature of the relationship between them, but not so as to substitute satisfaction of the occurrence of such conduct for proof of the act charged.

⁴⁶ It is possible that a number of other directions will also be required to be given, compounding the problem of jury overload.

⁴⁷ BWT (2002) 54 NSWLR 241.

⁴⁸ Hon. Justice Eames, ‘Towards a better direction - better communication with jurors’, (2003) 24 Australian Bar Review 35, 44.

(g) Any warning that may be necessary in relation to the use of coincidence evidence (under s 98 Evidence Act) where the accused is charged in the one indictment with sexual assault against two or more complainants, requiring the jury to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt first of the offences alleged in respect of one complainant, and then of the existence of such a substantial and relevant similarity between the two sets of acts as to exclude any acceptable explanation other than that the accused committed the offences against both complainants;

(h) A BRS direction (BRS v R (1997) 191 CLR 275) that where evidence revealing criminal or reprehensible propensity is admitted, but its use is limited to non propensity or tendency purposes, for example those considered proper in that case, then it is to be used only for those purposes and not as proof of the accused's guilt.

His Honour then commented:⁴⁹

In combination with the other standard directions customarily given in a criminal trial, and in particular any further warnings which may be required under s 165 of the Evidence Act, a trial judge is faced with a somewhat formidable task in sufficiently directing a jury in this category of case.

The jury is similarly faced with a potentially bewildering array of considerations, some of which may appear highly technical, if not inconsistent, to the lay mind and which, in any event, are likely to vex an experienced trial lawyer, even though they related to a simple factual dispute arising very often within a domestic setting ...

In all of these circumstances, bearing in mind also the desirability of containing a summing up to an acceptable length; of ensuring its immediate relevance to the actual trial (R v Zorad (1991) 19 NSWLR at 91, R v Williams (1990) 50 A Crim R 213, KRM v R, and R v Chai [2002] HCA 12 at [18]); of avoiding unnecessary judicial input into the fact finding process (Azzopardi v R [2001] HCA 24); and of paying due respect to the tactical considerations which are best judged by trial counsel in the actual atmosphere of the trial, I consider it timely for there to be a further review of the evidentiary, and other requirements of procedural law that apply to cases of sexual assault, particularly those involving children.

When are the Longman and Crofts Warnings Required?

2.2.8 It is unclear when the Longman and Crofts warnings are required to be given. For example, in GAR, Miles AJ said:⁵⁰

A failure to give a warning to the jury in accordance with what was said by the High Court in Longman... has become a common ground in appeals against conviction. There is a wide range of opinion about exactly what is meant by a Longman direction and when such a direction is required.

Similarly in BWT, Wood CJ at CL said:⁵¹

notwithstanding the number of times that the Longman direction has been considered, there still is a sharp division in the High Court (following Doggett v R) as to the circumstances when, and the terms in which, the necessary warning should be given.

2.2.9 In BFB, Doyle CJ said:⁵²

⁴⁹ BWT (2002) 54 NSWLR 241, [33] – [35].

⁵⁰ [2003] NSWCCA 224, [53].

⁵¹ (2002) 54 NSWLR 241, [31].

It appears that trial judges are having difficulty in applying to cases involving sexual offences the principle considered in Longman... The difficulty that trial judges are experiencing in this area is probably due to the fact that there are no hard and fast lines to be drawn.

2.2.10 It is not certain what length of delay will be considered to be ‘substantial’ such as to necessitate the giving of a Longman warning. In BFB Doyle CJ held,⁵³ ‘[s]ometimes a relatively short time will put the accused at a disadvantage. Sometimes a lengthy lapse of time will not put the accused at a disadvantage’. In Longman itself there was a delay of 20 years between alleged offence and trial. However, much shorter delays have been held to necessitate a warning. In Robinson v R,⁵⁴ R v Jolly,⁵⁵ R v Omarjee,⁵⁶ and R v Miletic,⁵⁷ for instance, the delay was about three years. In Jones v R,⁵⁸ the delay was four years, and in *R v Heuston*⁵⁹ a delay of six months. In the last two cases it was held that a full Longman warning was not required, although in Heuston, Hodgson JA held that for the sake of caution a warning about the reduced ability of the accused to challenge the Crown case and to make out any positive defence should have been given. His Honour also said that he found it very difficult to determine whether a Longman direction was called for in that case.⁶⁰ In King,⁶¹ the accused appealed his conviction for failure of the trial judge to give a Longman warning where the complainant’s delay in disclosing the sexual offences was only 26 days. While this appeal was dismissed, the fact that it was made suggests that uncertainty about when a warning must be given may promote the making of ambit appeals. The level of uncertainty in this area and its implications for trial judges in directing juries were noted by Sully J in BWT:⁶²

It is, I think, clear enough that a delay in the order of 20 years would require, imperatively in the view of the current majority opinion in the High Court, a Longman direction, and a strong one at that. What is not clear is whether there is any, and if so what, time lapse that would be generally regarded by current majority opinion in the High Court as not calling for the giving of a Longman direction.

While that state of affairs continues, it seems to me that the only prudent approach of a Trial Judge is one that regards any delay between offence and complaint as sufficient to raise for consideration the need for a Longman direction. That consideration should concentrate upon two related factors, namely, the actual lapse of time involved in the particular case; and the actual risk of relevant forensic disadvantage in the particular case. It seems to me that, as matters stand, a Trial Judge would be well advised to give a Longman direction unless it is possible to conclude reasonably: first, that the particular time lapse is so small that any reasonable mind would regard it as, in context, trifling; and secondly, that the risk of relevant forensic disadvantage would be seen by any reasonable mind as, (to borrow from Mason J in Wyong Shire Council v Shirt (1980) 146 CLR 40 at 47), “far-fetched or fanciful”.

2.2.11 The difficulty in achieving certainty in this area of the law is exacerbated by the fact that Longman itself does not clearly identify when a warning is necessary ‘save by reference to the loss by an accused of means of testing a complainant’s testimony which may not have been apparent to the jury’.⁶³ Moreover, in Longman and in other cases since the decisions in that case and in Crampton and Doggett, other circumstances have been identified as necessitating the giving of a Longman warning.

⁵² [2003] SASC 411, [36].

⁵³ BFB [2003] SASC 411, 38.

⁵⁴ (1999) 197 CLR 162.

⁵⁵ [1998] 4 VR 495.

⁵⁶ (1995) 79 A Crim R 355.

⁵⁷ [1997] 1 VR 593.

⁵⁸ (1997) 191 CLR 430. See also the discussion of this matter in R v GTN [2003] VSCA 38 per Eames JA (delay of 2–14 months).

⁵⁹ [2003] NSWCCA 172 per Hodgson JA.

⁶⁰ Ibid., [50].

⁶¹ [2000] NSWCCA 507.

⁶² (2002) 54 NSWLR 241, [95].

⁶³ R v GPP [2001] NSWCCA 493, [28] per Heydon JA.

They include cases where the nature of the relationship between the complainant and the accused might suggest that the allegations are untrustworthy, cases where ‘emotion, prejudice or suggestion’ may operate to distort recollection and cases where the age of the complainant at the time of the alleged offences coupled with a period of delay, may also lead to a distortion of recollected events. Such developments prompted Ormiston JA in Mazzolini,⁶⁴ at 130, to voice similar disquiet to that expressed by Sully J and Wood CJ at CL in BWT:

As defence counsel catalogue the variety of ‘special’ circumstances seen by appellate judges (including, I confess, myself) as requiring warnings in particular cases, so trial judges will retreat to the safety of issuing Longman warnings for every such circumstance and every faintly analogous circumstance ...

In LTP,⁶⁵ Dunford J stated that, ‘...it is preferable to give the directions, even if the judge considers one or more of them unnecessary in the particular case, rather than have convictions upset on appeal because of a failure to give them.’ It is, of course, understandable why judges would take such an approach. The consequences for the complainant of any successful appeal (for example a retrial) are ones that trial judges are likely to go to some lengths to avoid. The fact that they feel impelled to do this, however, then entrenches the practice of giving the warning even where a warning is possibly unnecessary or counterproductive.

2.2.12 Ormiston JA also commented in Mazzolini on other potential consequences of trial judges’ ‘retreat to safety’. His Honour suggested that by doing so trial judges will once again give the appearance of judicial imprimatur to the recasting of sexual assault complainants, despite protestations to the contrary by the High Court in Longman, as an unreliable class of witness. He said:⁶⁶

Since the issue seems only (or almost only) to arise on trials for sexual offences (and appeals therefrom), the impression might be given, ...that judges are again, by a back door, treating complainants in such cases as ordinarily unreliable witnesses...

This problem was also alluded to by Deane J in Longman. His Honour stated:⁶⁷

Another problem about a general rule of practice that requires such an unqualified warning is that it inevitably involves an element of disparagement of the complaint in that it places the complainant in a special category of suspect witness.

Similarly in BFB Doyle CJ said:⁶⁸

The giving of excessive and inappropriate warnings will be unfair to complainants, contrary to the public interest in a regularly conducted trial process, confusing to juries and runs the risk of returning this aspect of the law to an approach from which Parliament endeavoured to extract it...

2.2.13 Uncertainty about the application of Longman is also created by the nature of sexual offence cases, which, as Winneke P pointed out in *Olivar*⁶⁹ is that, no two cases are alike, and it is not possible to argue that because a “Longman warning” was given in one case, therefore it must be given in another. The facts of the particular case will govern the nature and type of directions which the trial judge believes are appropriate.

2.2.14 The problem is further compounded because in some sexual assault cases, appeal courts have overturned convictions due to inadequacies or errors in trial judges’ warnings, even though the ⁶⁴ [1999] 3 VR 113, 130.

⁶⁵ [2004] NSWCCA 109, [47].

⁶⁶ Mazzolini [1999] 3 VR 113, 130 per Ormiston JA.

⁶⁷ (1989) CLR 79, 93.

⁶⁸ [2004] SASC 411, [38].

⁶⁹ [2004] VSCA 41, [7].

defence did not request such a warning at trial and where there may have been sound tactical reasons why defence counsel did not request a warning.⁷⁰ In WRC, James J commented:⁷¹

In my view, even though no application for a proper direction is made, even where, as here, conviction on all or most counts in both trials would be inevitable, the present state of the law requires that unless there is a direction which approaches nearly enough to the Longman requirements so that the jury could be seen to have the requisite understanding, the appeal should be allowed.

2.2.15 The environment of procedural uncertainty and judicial variation in this area of the law has created ongoing difficulties because the current law offers almost no guidance to trial judges on the circumstances in which a warning might be required.⁷² This has been evidenced in situations where even though there is no clear special need for a warning, trial courts give these or stronger warnings, apparently mindful that convictions are often overturned on appeal if a trial judge has not given as adequate warning.⁷³

2.2.16 The Crofts direction that often overlaps with the Longman warning in sexual offences cases, suffers from the same uncertainty as to when it should be given. Heydon JA in *GPP*⁷⁴ commented that, 'Longman v R was referred to in Crofts v R (1996) 186 CLR 427 at 435 and 446, but not in a manner casting significant light on the circumstances in which the warning should be given.' In the absence of specific guidance from the High Court, the trend observable in the case law has been for trial judges to give, and appeal courts to require them to give, a Crofts direction whenever there is evidence of delay in complaint. Overwhelmingly, current authority suggests that the Crofts direction should be given 'as a general rule'.⁷⁵ This approach applies even where there has been explanation of or reasons given for the delay. Accordingly, while the legislative reforms aimed to eliminate the giving of indiscriminate warnings about delayed complaint and misconceptions about the implications of that delay for questions of complainants' credibility, the result of the decision in Crofts appears to have been to restore such indiscriminate warnings and misconceptions. On this point, the Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC) in its report, Sexual Offences: Law and Procedure, quoted the New South Wales Standing Committee on Law and Justice:⁷⁶

While the Committee notes the argument that the Crofts warning was "not meant to revive the stereotypical view that delay is invariably a sign of the falsity of the complaint", the Committee is of the opinion that such is the unavoidable result of a warning to the jury that in assessing the complainant's credibility, they should take into account the complainant's failure to complain promptly.

2.2.17 Because the premise on which the 'balancing' Crofts warning is based derives from the 'collective experience of courts in sexual offences cases' rather than from the particular facts of the case being tried, and because other experience and knowledge, (including knowledge derived from empirical research⁷⁷), is to the contrary effect, continued application of the Crofts principle may further erode respect for the criminal courts and criminal justice process in this area. There is clear evidence that in many quarters the judiciary is considered to be ill-informed about modern understandings of sexual assault and sexual assault complainants, to be out of touch with developments in this area and to adhere to conservative and gender-biased views.⁷⁸

⁷⁰ See the judgment of Sully J in BWT (2002) 54 NSWLR 241.

⁷¹ [2002] NSWCCA 210, [121].

⁷² Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC), Sexual Offences: Law and Procedure, Final Report (2004) 7.121.

⁷³ Kathy Mack, "You should scrutinise her evidence with great care": Corroboration of women's testimony about sexual assault' in Patricia Eastal (ed), Balancing the Scales: Rape, Law Reform and Australian Culture (1998), 73.

⁷⁴ (2001) 129 A Crim R 1.

⁷⁵ See comments to this effect in Markuleski [2001] NSWCCA 290 per Spigelman CJ, Carruthers AJ agreeing, and per Wood CJ at CL.

⁷⁶ VLRC, above n 72, 7.90.

⁷⁷ See 1.1.3 above.

⁷⁸ The Australian Law Reform Commission (ALRC), Equality Before the Law: Women's Equality, Report No 69 (Part II), 1994.

The Crofts and Longman Warnings Resurrect Outmoded Views about the Reliability of Sexual Offences Complainants

2.2.18 As noted above, the Longman and Crofts warnings have been criticised as potentially reinstating, ‘by the back door’, false stereotypes about the unreliability of complainants in sexual offences cases. This danger was mentioned by Omiston JA in Mazzolini, Doyle CJ in BFB and by Deane J in Longman. Judicial protestations in Longman, Crampton, Doggett and Crofts that the principles they propound are not intended to resurrect or to be interpreted as endorsing these stereotypes may be perceived as merely a cloak for underlying prejudice expressed in confusing and contradictory terms. The problem of the resurrection of false stereotypes arises principally because of the uncertainty about when the warnings are required to be given. This uncertainty can then prompt trial judges to give them routinely even indiscriminately in an attempt to avoid appeal. It arises also, in the case of the Longman warning, because it may be required to be given even where there is significant corroboration of the complainant’s allegations and because this warning operates as an irrebuttable presumption of law (see further below at 2.3). The form of the warning is problematic in this regard. The requirement to warn the jury that it is ‘dangerous to convict’, as noted by Wood CJ at CL in BWT, may be treated by juries as an encoded message to acquit even though the intention is only to alert juries to the need to scrutinise the complainant’s evidence carefully. His Honour said:⁷⁹ any direction, framed in terms of it being “dangerous or unsafe” to convict, risks being perceived as a not too subtle encouragement by the trial judge to acquit, whereas what in truth the jury is being asked to do is to scrutinize the evidence with great care.

2.2.19 Inevitably, a suggestion that it is ‘dangerous to convict’ on the complainant’s unsupported testimony must cast her or him as an unreliable witness and, given the mandatory nature of the warning, must cast all complainants who delay in making complaint as unreliable.

2.2.20 It has now long been recognised that lack of proximate complaint by sexual assault complainants has little real bearing on the genuineness of the allegations made.⁸⁰ Therefore, the High Court decisions in Crofts and Longman, because they purport to be based upon the collective experience of the courts, suggest that such collective experience is a faulty base on which to assess issues of credibility. Accordingly, they run the risk of bringing that collective experience into disrepute.

2.2.21 While it is acknowledged that the central intentions of the Longman and Crofts warnings are the achievement of fair trials and a fair balance between the interests of accused and complainants in the conduct of trials, they have been justifiably criticised as striking that balance too much in favour of the accused.⁸¹

2.2.22 The principal circumstance identified by the High Court as giving rise to the need for the warning in Longman was the substantial delay between the occurrence of the offences and their reporting and hence prosecution. However, other matters were identified by McHugh J and Deane J as warranting the giving of a warning. McHugh J suggested that the judge should have cautioned the jury regarding the complainant’s hostility towards the accused as a matter that may have impacted upon the accuracy of her recollection of events. In fact the complainant’s evidence was not that she was hostile in a general sense towards the accused but that she hated him because of what he had done to her. She said, ‘I hate him for what he did to me’. It is difficult to see why this matter would require a warning. Deane J further relied upon the fact that the sexual contact was non-violent, that the complainant had been only six years old at the time of the alleged offences and that she had been woken from sleep on each occasion. He pointed to the possibility that she had been fantasising and the difficulty that she may have had in distinguishing fact from fantasy. None of these matters can justify the giving of a warning. In fact they reflect discredited common law stereotypes about sexual assault and sexual assault complainants – that ‘real rape’ involves violence (apart from the sexual offence itself); that children are inherently untrustworthy witnesses and that they may fantasise about sex. It is absurd to suggest that children of six would fantasise about sex or have difficulty in knowing the reality of a sexual assault upon them. Our knowledge of sexual assaults perpetrated upon children clearly shows that neither the age of the complainant nor the ‘non-violent’ circumstances of the offence provide a proper foundation in themselves for an inference of unreliability.⁸² Prejudice to the accused arising from a long delay in the prosecution of the offence is of an altogether different order to such matters. While these additional matters rest upon discredited assumptions and prejudices, logic tells us that lengthy delay is capable, in many cases, of impacting adversely upon an accused’s ability to challenge the Crown case. Nevertheless, delay may not always have this effect and the irrebuttable presumption that it does so is problematic.

⁷⁹ BWT (2002) 54 NSWLR 241, [34] per Wood CJ at CL.

⁸⁰ See discussion above at 1.1.3.

⁸¹ Justice James Wood suggested that where there is not a ‘firm basis’ for suggesting that delay in complaint has actually affected the complainant’s credibility, the Crofts direction may tip the balance too far in favour of the accused, see ‘Complaint and Medical Examination Evidence in Sexual Assault Trials’ (2003) 15(8) Judicial Officers’ Bulletin 63; See also VLRC, above n 72.

2.3 Longman Warning as an Irrebuttable Presumption of Law

2.3.1 The effect of the decision in Longman, as interpreted in Crampton and Doggett, is also controversial and problematic because it creates an irrebuttable presumption that the accused has been prejudiced by the complainant’s delay in making a complaint. Wood CJ at CL in BWT explained this matter:⁸³

[His Honour began by quoting from the relevant passages in Doggett, Crampton and Longman then continued:] These passages have been taken up, so it seems to me, as requiring that an instruction in equally positive terms, be given in every case involving a substantial delay, irrespective of whether or not there is any evidence, or basis beyond suspicion, that the absence of contemporaneity between the alleged offence and complaint, or trial has in fact (not “might have”) denied to the accused a proper opportunity to meet the charge or charges brought: see for example R v Roddom [2001] NSWCCA 168, R v GJH [2001] NSWCCA 128 and R v Roberts [2001] NSWCCA 163.

Put another way, the effect of these decisions has been to give rise to an irrebuttable presumption that the delay has prevented the accused from adequately testing and meeting the complainant’s evidence; and that, as a consequence, the jury must be given a warning to that effect irrespective of whether or not the accused was in fact prejudiced in this way.

The difficulty which I have with this proposition is that it elevates the presumption of innocence, which must be preserved at all costs, to an assumption that the accused was in fact innocent, and that he or she might have called relevant evidence, or cross examined the complainant in a way that would have rebutted the prosecution case, had there been a contemporaneity between the alleged offence and the complaint or charge. That consideration loses all of its force if, in fact, the accused did commit the offence. In that event there would have been no evidence available of a positive kind, relating for example to the existence or ownership of the premises, or of a motor vehicle or other item, associated with the offence charged, or going to establish an alibi for the relevant occasion, no matter how contemporaneous the complaint or charge was with the offence.

2.3.2 While it is acknowledged that delay in making a complaint can disadvantage many accused in preparing their defence, where there has been no such disadvantage, or where no specific disadvantage can be indicated, application of the Longman warning is irrational. It is therefore preferable that the circumstances where a Longman warning must be given should be limited to situations where an accused can show a specific disadvantage caused by the delay, rather than a hypothetical, presumptive disadvantage.

⁸² See for eg J Cashmore and K Bussey, ‘Disclosure of Child Sexual Abuse: Issues from a Child Oriented Perspective’ (1988) 23 Australian Journal of Social Issues 13, 21-22.

⁸³ (2002) 54 NSWLR 241, [13] – [15] (emphasis added).

2.3.3 In summary, the case for reform resides in the complexity, uncertainty and unsound basis of the current law constituted by the Crofts and Longman warnings, in their operative impact in resurrecting false stereotypes about complainants in sexual offences cases and, in the case of the Longman warning, in its likely interpretation as an instruction to acquit. The Institute is therefore of the view that the law relating to the warnings required to be given to juries in sexual offences cases relating to delay in complaint should be reformed.

2.4 Submissions

2.4.1 The six submissions received by the Institute in reply to the Issues Paper provided mixed responses on the need for reform of the law pertaining to warnings relating to delayed complaint in sexual offences cases: some submissions advocated reform, some thought reform unnecessary and others were non-committal.

2.4.2 The submissions focussed on how such warnings operate in the Tasmanian context, in particular on the fact that the giving of Longman and Crofts warnings in Tasmania has not given rise to appeals in the way that has occurred in other Australian jurisdictions. Cases in other Australian jurisdictions, particularly New South Wales, indicate that judges are adopting a cautious approach in sexual offence cases where there has been a delay in the making of a complaint. The judiciary in these jurisdictions tend to give Crofts and Longman warnings to juries in almost all sexual offence cases involving delay in complaint, unless the delay can be categorised as trivial or trifling.

2.4.3 Michael Daly, on behalf of the Tasmanian Independent Bar, submitted that there is no need for reform because none of the cases cited in the Issues Paper are Tasmanian. He went on to say, '[t]he practical, procedural and theoretical problems, of which the issues paper makes so much, do not seem to have arisen in the Tasmanian context.' Accordingly, he submitted that 'the recommendations for reform in Tasmania are thereby premature and quite possibly flawed.'

2.4.4 While the pattern of appeal relating to delay in complaint in sexual offences cases in Tasmania appears, at present, to differ to that in other Australian jurisdictions, the fact that significant problems have arisen elsewhere should not be ignored. Tasmanian evidence legislation mirrors that of New South Wales and in that jurisdiction (as well as others) the complex and confusing nature of the warnings has prompted a significant level of judicial concern and critical comment. The volume of relevant cases in New South Wales is much greater than in Tasmania, and consequently the opportunities for the law to develop and reveal problems in that jurisdiction are much greater. The empirical evidence in other jurisdictions also indicates that it would be unwise for Tasmania not to heed the critique coming from elsewhere. Further, the desirability for uniformity expressed by the Australian Law Reform Commission (ALRC) (as well as New South Wales Law Reform Commission (NSWLRC) and VLRC) in their review of the Uniform Evidence Acts supports the argument for reform.⁸⁴

2.4.5 As demonstrated in the Issues Paper, the difficulties concerning Crofts and Longman warnings are significant (while perhaps currently dormant in Tasmania). It is clear that the Longman and Crofts warnings are inherently flawed, in both practical and theoretical terms, and accordingly their reform is desirable.

2.4.6 Mr Tim Ellis SC, the Tasmanian Director of Public Prosecutions, argued that the concerns presented by the Crofts and Longman warnings are merely the tip of the iceberg of greater problems relating to judicial encroachment on the jury's function by the 'multiplicity of judicial warnings now required.’ Referring to a paper he presented to the Heads of Prosecution Agencies of the Commonwealth in 2003, he stated:

⁸⁴ See below 3.1.2.

The traditional distinction of the roles of judges and jury in a criminal trial stresses that the judge is to direct the jury on the law but the jury are the “sole judges on the facts”. Model summings-up stress this separation of functions.

However, in modern times Australian courts have developed a body of law which places an obligation on the trial judge to warn the jury of the “dangers” of acting on certain evidence or to otherwise give strong direction to the jury on how it is to regard certain kinds of evidence.

Noting some of the warnings developed by the High Court, including the Longman warning, Mr Ellis went on to say:

The occasions upon which a warning might be held to have been required are many and varied, and have increased significantly in the last 20 or so years. The consequence of there being a failure to warn when the occasion is identified (by an appeal court) to have arisen is that a verdict will almost invariably be set aside as unsafe and unsatisfactory. This will occur whether or not the “danger” was fully argued to the jury by counsel – the jury will still apparently be presumed to be insufficiently aware of the “danger” without the judge pointing it out from on high.

The effect has been that appeals are routinely conducted with a complete focus on what the trial judge did not say as to the facts – not the law – for these warnings go to what the jury as fact finder is to do.

Reasonable warnings clearly open on the evidence are thus liable to being set aside because it is assumed that without the benefit of (what should have been) the trial judge’s view about how certain witnesses or factual matrices should be viewed and dealt with, the jury’s verdict has insufficient quality to stand. The judicial view of the facts is thus elevated in importance above that of the jury’s.

Part 3

Options for Reform

3.1.1 Like the law in Tasmania, the law of evidence elsewhere in Australia is a mixture of statute and common law. In 2001 the Tasmanian Evidence Act 2001 was enacted as part of an endeavour to simplify and unify evidence laws across Australia. The uniform evidence law applies in Tasmania, New South Wales, the Australian Capital Territory, Norfolk Island and the federal courts.

3.1.2 The harmonisation of the laws of evidence in Australia has recently gained extra momentum from the jointly authored Review of the Uniform Evidence Acts (ALRC DP 69).⁸⁵ The major participants in this review were the Commonwealth, New South Wales and Victorian Law Reform Commissions. The review specifically involved inquiries into the Evidence Act 1995 (Cth), Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) and Evidence Act 1958 (Vic), and was authorised by terms of reference issued from within each jurisdiction. The Commonwealth and New South Wales terms of reference referred to ‘the spirit of the uniform Evidence Act scheme’ and authorised inquiries ‘with a view to maintaining and furthering harmonisation of the laws of evidence throughout Australia.’⁸⁶ The Tasmanian Law Reform Institute also contributed to the review, providing a representative on the ALRC Consultative Committee and participating in the drafting of proposals to go to that Committee. The VLRC participated in the review in view of the fact that the uniform legislation is being considered for adoption in Victoria. As part of the review, the ALRC consulted all non-uniform Evidence Act jurisdictions in order to promote widespread adoption of the uniform scheme. Non-uniform Act jurisdictions currently considering adopting the uniform legislation are Western Australia, Queensland and the Northern Territory. It is important, therefore, that review of any of the provisions of the Tasmanian Act take into account developments and recommendations for reform in other uniform Evidence Act jurisdictions and in those jurisdictions that are moving towards adopting the uniform legislation.

3.1.3 The connection between the Institute’s current inquiry into warnings in sexual offences cases relating to delay in complaint and the review of the Uniform Evidence Acts conducted by the Australian, New South Wales and Victorian Law Reform Commissions is detailed at the end of chapter 16 of ALRC DP 69.⁸⁷ As part of their joint review, the Commissions invited submissions on the Longman warning, the Crofts direction and took into account the proposals contained in the Tasmania Law Reform Institute’s Issues Paper No. 8.⁸⁸

3.1.4 On 8 February 2006, the final report from the joint review, Uniform Evidence Law (ALRC 102),⁸⁹ was tabled in the Commonwealth and Victorian parliaments, and released in NSW.

3.2 Repeal of s 165(5)?

3.2.1 Because the Longman and Crofts warnings apply in Tasmanian proceedings principally by virtue of s 165(5) Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) which preserves the power of the trial judge to give common law warnings, a possible option for reform is to repeal this provision. The aim of this reform

⁸⁵ Australian Law Reform Commission (ALRC), New South Wales Law Reform Commission (NSWLRC) and Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC), Review of the Uniform Evidence Acts, ALRC Discussion Paper 69, NSWLRC Discussion Paper 47, VLRC Discussion Paper (2005) (ALRC DP 69).

⁸⁶ Ibid.

⁸⁷ Ibid., 16.92-16.126.

⁸⁸ Warnings in Sexual Offences Cases Relating to Delay in Complaint, Issues Paper No. 8 (2005).

⁸⁹ ALRC, NSWLRC and VLRC, Uniform Evidence Law, ALRC Report 102, NSWLRC Report 112, VLRC Final Report (2005) (ALRC 102).

would be to encourage trial judges to give warnings in accordance with s 165(1), (2), (3) and (4) rather than in accordance with the common law under s 165(5). This reform would not proscribe a warning being given to the jury in cases where there is substantial delay in complaint.⁹⁰ The trial judge would retain the power to warn under s 165(1) of the Act on the basis that the evidence of the complainant ‘is of a kind’ that falls within that section. However, two primary benefits may be gained from encouraging trial judges to apply s 165(1), (2) and (3) rather than the common law. First, subsection (2) makes the giving of a warning conditional on the request of a party. It may, therefore, preclude a party from deploying the strategy of not requesting a warning for tactical reasons, then subsequently lodging an appeal on the basis that no warning was given. Second, the warning under subsection (2) is not formulated as a ‘dangerous to convict’ warning. Instead it requires the trial judge to warn the jury that the evidence may be unreliable, to inform the jury of the reasons why it may be unreliable and to warn of the need for caution in accepting the evidence and determining what weight to assign to it. A warning formulated in this way may be less likely to be perceived as a coded direction to acquit. Finally, subsection (3) enables a trial judge to decline to give a warning where there are good reasons for not doing so.

3.2.2 The fair trial imperative, which might in some cases be seen to justify the giving of a warning irrespective of request, could be accommodated by inserting in s 165 a subsection akin to s 132 of the Act. This subsection would require the trial judge to alert a party to the effect of s 165(1) and (2) where it appears to the trial judge that the party may have grounds for requesting that a warning be given. It might provide, for example:

If it appears to the court that a party may have grounds for requesting a warning under this section, the Court must satisfy itself (if there is a jury, in the absence of the jury) that the party is aware of the right to request such a warning.

However, this is not recommended because counsel should be aware of the provisions in s 165. Accordingly, to impose a mandatory provision akin to s 132 in this context might unnecessarily complicate proceedings and again raise the spectre of unwarranted appeals. Where unrepresented litigants are concerned, trial judges are, of course, able to alert them to the potential desirability of a warning.

3.2.3 Section 165(5) is based on recommendations made by the ALRC in ALRC Interim Report No 26 and Evidence, Report No 38, 1987. These recommendations were made prior to the High Court decisions in Longman and Crofts, at the time when sexual assault prosecutions relating to children (at the time of the assault) were relatively infrequent and when the escalation in the complexity and number of judicial warnings was yet to occur. Consequently, the inclusion of s 165(5) at that time did not carry with it the practical judicial burden that its application now requires. Further, the ALRC draft Evidence Bill (1987) reflected now discredited perceptions of sexual assault complainants. For example, the draft Bill’s equivalent of s 165(1) listed as a class of unreliable witness, victims of alleged sexual offences in proceedings relating to those offences (see clause 140(1)(e) of the Bill). The past 15 years has provided much prosecution and trial experience of both children and adults as victims of sexual assault and has enhanced understandings of both child and adult complainants in sexual assault proceedings. To some extent this enhanced understanding gained a foothold in the uniform evidence legislation enacted in 1995 in New South Wales and the Commonwealth and in 2001 in Tasmania – sexual assault complainants were not listed in s 165(1) as a class of unreliable witness. Nevertheless, dated and inappropriate attitudes towards sexual assault complainants persist and apply under the legislation by virtue of s 165(5).

⁹⁰ It would also not prevent trial judges from giving warnings relating to other categories of unreliable evidence such as the McKinney (1991) 171 CLR 468 and Domican (1992) 173 CLR 555 warnings.

Submissions

3.2.4 The responses to the issues paper that specifically considered the repeal of s 165(5) of the Evidence Act were generally of the view that the provision is unnecessary and that its repeal would have no impact on the powers of judges to ensure fair trials. As discussed, this section enables Longman and Crofts warnings to be given by trial judges in Tasmanian criminal proceedings. However, trial judges have a number of other powers to give Longman and Crofts warnings to the jury if they believe it is necessary. Such warnings may be given in accordance with s 165(1-4) or s 9 of the Evidence Act.

3.2.5 Section 165(5) appears to be largely superfluous, and, as Crawford J of the Supreme Court submits, the effect of its repeal ‘will not be significant’. The repeal of the section would not have an adverse impact on the fair trial imperative that is safeguarded in the legislation. However, as the submission from Scott Tilyard, Assistant Commissioner of Tasmania Police, states, the proposal to repeal s 165(5) could go some way to ‘ensuring that the Crofts and Longman warnings would only be given in appropriate circumstances.’

3.2.6 The Australian, New South Wales and Victorian Law Reform Commission considered the limitations of s 165(5) in their discussion paper on the review of the Uniform Evidence Acts.⁹¹ Rather than repeal the provision, the Commissions were of the view that s 165(5) may be improved by delimiting the scope of its operation. One of the solutions suggested by the Commissions to the problems stemming from this provision is,⁹²

... to subject s 165(5) to the same limitation as applies to warnings under s 165(2), namely that the parties must request that the warning be given. Such an approach will not exclude appellate intervention where counsel fails to request a particular warning. The question on appeal will be whether the failure of counsel to request a warning has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Such an amendment will clarify the trial judge’s obligation to give warnings and potentially reduce the volume of appeals and retrials in this area.

An alternative solution suggested by the Commissions ‘might be to amend the uniform Evidence Acts to provide that the judge’s common law obligations to give warnings continue to operate unless all the parties agree that a warning should not be given.’⁹³

In making these proposals the Commissions argued that,⁹⁴

[a] benefit of either approach is that it should become a matter of routine for the trial judge to ask counsel to consider what warnings they will seek and to identify any such warnings prior to charging the jury. If the judge is concerned that counsel has erroneously failed to seek a particular warning, the judge can question counsel to ensure that the question has been considered and place on the record counsel’s reason for not seeking the warning.

3.2.7 While the proposals advanced by the Commissions in their discussion paper on the review of the uniform Evidence Acts may encourage judges to attempt to formulate directions appropriate to the particular circumstances of the case rather than give ritualistic warnings irrespective of the circumstances, they fail to address central problems related to the warnings. Specifically, issues relating to the complexity of the warnings and their potentially confusing nature remain. The outmoded views about the unreliability of sexual offence complainants are not dealt with and the problem that the Longman warning acts as an irrebuttable presumption of law regardless of the particular circumstances of the case is only partially tackled. These issues are likely to persist unless s

⁹¹ ALRC NSWLRC and VLRC, above n 85, 16.122 - 16.126.

⁹² Ibid, 16.123.

⁹³ Ibid, 16.124.

⁹⁴ Ibid, 16.126.

165(5) is amended and the application of the Longman and Crofts warnings are limited by more profound statutory amendment.

Recommendations

3.2.8 The Longman and Crofts warnings apply in uniform Evidence Acts jurisdictions by virtue of s 165(5). The repeal of s 165(5) and specific and express reform of the Longman and Crofts warnings (see below) will considerably reduce the uncertainties that flow from these common law warnings. Nevertheless, s 9 of the Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) will continue to enable common law warnings to be given and the other sub-sections in s 165 will continue to operate to safeguard a fair trial. Other warnings such as the *McKinney*⁹⁵ and the *Domican*⁹⁶ warnings may also still be given under s 165(1) and by virtue of s 9. Section 165(2) makes warnings relating to potentially unreliable evidence conditional upon the request of a party and states what needs to be said in a warning. Sub-section (3) enables the judge to decline to give a warning where there are good reasons for not doing so and sub-section (4) expressly allows a judge not to use the ‘dangerous to convict’ formula.

The repeal of s 165(5) together with the specific and express reforms to the Longman and Crofts doctrines outlined below will serve to improve the legal environment in which sexual offence cases relating to delay in complaint take place.

Recommendation 1:

That s 165(5) of the Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) be repealed.

3.3 Longman Warning

3.3.1 While repeal of s 165(5) is a step in the right direction, it will not be a sufficient reform. This is because neither s 164, (which abolishes corroboration requirements), nor the remaining subsections of s 165, prohibit the giving of common law warnings or limit the giving of warnings about the reliability of evidence to warnings given in accordance with s 165. Further, s 9 of the Evidence Act provides that the Act does not affect the operation of a principle or rule of common law or equity, except so far as the Act provides otherwise expressly or by necessary intendment. Accordingly, the Longman and Crofts doctrines may continue to apply by virtue of a trial judge’s obligation to ensure a fair trial for the accused. Therefore, it is suggested that further reform should be enacted expressly limiting the application of Longman and Crofts.

3.3.2 The VLRC has recommended that the law be reformed to restrict the giving of the Longman warning to situations where the trial judge is satisfied that certain specific circumstances exist, namely, where there is evidence that the accused has suffered an identifiable forensic disadvantage as a result of the delay in complaint or there is evidence that the accused has been prejudiced in some other way as a result of other circumstances. The Commission has also recommended reform of the requirement to couch the warning in the terms, ‘dangerous to convict’. Its recommendations are:⁹⁷

...(1)(c) The judge must not warn, or suggest in any way to the jury that it is dangerous to convict the accused, unless satisfied that:

(i) there is evidence that the accused has in fact suffered some specific forensic disadvantage due to a substantial delay in reporting; or ⁹⁵ (1991) 171 CLR 468.

⁹⁶ (1992) 173 CLR 555.

⁹⁷ VLRC, above n 72, 7.122 – 7.132.

(ii) there is evidence that the accused has in fact been prejudiced as a result of other circumstances in the particular case.

(d) If the judge is satisfied in accordance with subsection (c) that a jury warning is required, the judge may warn the jury in terms she or he thinks appropriate having regard to the circumstances of the particular case.

(e) In giving a jury warning pursuant to subsection (d), it is not necessary for the judge to use the words 'dangerous or unsafe to convict'.

3.3.3 It is questionable whether the recommended Victorian reform will actually achieve its legislative intent and displace the requirement to give a Longman warning. It may still permit continued operation of Longman in its existing form. Reform in this area may need to take a more mandatory or prescriptive form. For example, subsection (1)(e) does not proscribe the use of the dangerous to convict formulation. It just provides that use of that formulation is not necessary. This potentially leaves room for trial judges to continue to employ the dangerous to convict formulation and it may be that they will adhere to this formulation in order to avoid appeal. The cases to date demonstrate a clear trend on the part of trial judges to 'retreat to the safety' of issuing Longman warnings whether truly warranted or not in order to insulate their jury directions against appeal. Similarly, the removal of the requirement to give a dangerous to convict warning as formulated in subsection (1)(c)(i) and (ii) may be inadequate. These provisions permit a Longman warning where there is evidence of some specific forensic disadvantage suffered by the accused or where there is evidence that the accused has in fact been prejudiced as a result of other circumstances. The reasoning in Longman, Crompton and Doggett was that an accused has necessarily suffered a forensic disadvantage by reason of the delay. In other words, the fact of delay is seen as a sufficient factual foundation for giving of a warning. It is possible that the same reasoning could be read into the proposed Victorian reforms. Judges may therefore view these reforms as not providing a sufficiently express, clear or mandated exclusion of Longman to justify departure from it. Accordingly, in the Issues Paper the Institute expressed the preliminary view that what may be required to displace the irrebuttable presumption created by Longman is a clear statement that no such presumption is to be applied and that a warning in the Longman terms is only to be given where the existence of a specific forensic disadvantage is established by the accused on the balance of probabilities, that disadvantage not being established by the mere fact of delay. Alternatively, it was suggested that the reform might take the form of permitting a warning only where there are exceptional circumstances, and that delay alone will not establish those exceptional circumstances.

Submissions

3.3.4 The issues paper doubted whether the VLRC recommendations would restrict Longman warnings in sexual offences cases to those cases where the accused has suffered a specific disadvantage because of the delay. The reform proposals recommended by the VLRC to displace the requirement to give the warning in all cases were considered by some of the responses to the issues paper.

3.3.5 Wanda Buza from Women Tasmania and Scott Tilyard from Tasmania Police did not support the type of recommendations issued by the VLRC and the latter noted that there was some ambiguity around the proposed wording that the VLRC recommended. Crawford J of the Supreme Court also suggested that the proposals in Victoria would not have their intended effect:

I do not think that the recommended Victorian reform will displace the requirement for a Longman warning in many cases. In most cases of substantial delay in making a complaint, and I am particularly referring to a delay of several years, the forensic disadvantage to the accused is obvious and what it is should be pointed out to the jury.

3.3.6 Michael Daly from the Tasmanian Independent Bar submitted that the 'Victorian position seems a sensible enough response to the situation that the research found to exist in Victoria.' Further, he submitted that research of the type conducted in Victoria by the VLRC prior to the development of its reform proposals is ‘necessary and invaluable prior to making meaningful recommendations about need for reform to the law in Tasmania.’ He is unconvinced of the need for reform in this area of the law in Tasmania because of the lack of qualitative empirical research of judges’ charges to juries in Tasmanian sexual offence cases.

3.3.7 Tim Ellis SC, the Director of Public Prosecutions, did not consider that the VLRC recommendations would reduce the necessity to give Longman warnings. He was also unconvinced by the alternative reform proposals put forward by the Institute. The Institute raised the prospect of Longman warnings only being given where the existence of a specific forensic disadvantage is established on the balance of probabilities (a disadvantage that is not established by the mere fact of delay) or where there are exceptional circumstances (delay alone not establishing those exceptional circumstances). Mr Ellis commented:

... the imposition on the defendant of a burden of proof of exceptional circumstances or the loss of a specific forensic disadvantage before such a warning is given might set the bar too high the other way, particularly as the defendant usually bears no onus in a prosecution. Driving the accused to the witness-box, or having him or her adduce evidence and lose the right to last address to satisfy these tests might also be an unfair result.

3.3.8 Crawford J of the Supreme Court also did not support the proposals put forward by the Institute. He stated that such proposals, if applied, will, create something which your paper purports to seek to avoid, that is difficulty for trial judges and grounds for appeal.

3.3.9 Scott Tilyard from Tasmania Police expressed a preference for the Institute’s options when compared to the VLRC recommendation. According to Tasmania Police, the notion of an exceptional circumstances test as a requirement before a Longman warning is given ‘provides the judiciary with greater flexibility’, but he also conceded that defining ‘exceptional circumstances’ may be ‘problematic.’

Recommendations

3.3.10 The Longman warning has developed into a ritualistic warning about the danger of acting upon the uncorroborated testimony of a victim of a sexual assault where there is a delay between the assault and the subsequent complaint. There has been significant judicial and extra-judicial criticism of the warning. The continued operation of the Longman warning should be limited and clarified .

Views of the Australian and Victorian Law Reform Commissions

3.3.11 As mentioned previously in the discussion of ALRC DP 69, the Law Reform Commissions undertaking the review asked whether the recommendations proposed by the Institute in relation to the Longman warning (or any other models) should be adopted as part of the uniform Evidence Acts.⁹⁸ The final report on Uniform Evidence Law delivered by the Australian, New South Wales and Victorian Law Reform Commissions argued that there is ‘pressing need for reform’⁹⁹ as indicated by the considerable number of submissions the review received, the consultations it conducted and the number of judicial statements in appellate judgments on the operation of the Longman warning. Specifically, the ALRC and VLRC argued that there is merit in a legislative amendment clarifying the operation of the Longman warning. They concluded,¹⁰⁰ that there should not be an irrebuttable presumption of forensic disadvantage arising from delay, and that warnings in relation to forensic disadvantage arising from delay should only be given where there is an identifiable risk of prejudice to the accused. Such prejudice should not be assumed to exist merely because of the passage of time.

⁹⁸ See above, 3.1.3.

⁹⁹ ALRC, NSWLRC and VLRC, above n 89, 18.116.

¹⁰⁰ Ibid, 18.121.

These two commissions recommended that the uniform Evidence Acts be amended to regulate and limit the operation of Longman.¹⁰¹ The NSWLRC, on the other hand, did not support a codification of the requirements for a Longman warning.¹⁰²

Views of the Institute

3.3.12 Consistent with the conclusions and recommendations of the ALRC and the VLRC in the final report on Uniform Evidence Law, the Institute is of the view that new provisions should also be inserted into the Tasmanian Evidence Act 2001 that articulate the circumstances in which and the type of warnings that should be given and comments that should be made when there is significant delay in complaint. As the principles expressed by Longman have a broad application and are not confined just to sexual offences cases, the new provisions will also have a broad application, relating to all cases where there is delay in the reporting of an offence.

3.3.13 Having considered the submissions of Crawford J, Mr Ellis and Scott Tilyard the Institute is now of the view that a burden of proof should not be placed upon the accused to establish forensic disadvantage. To do so may necessitate the implementation of procedures at trial that complicate rather than facilitate the trial judge's task of determining when and what warnings or explanations should be given. The Institute now recommends that the Evidence Act should be reformed to accommodate two different situations – a) that where specific evidence is adduced at trial of an identified forensic disadvantage suffered by the accused; b) the situation where there is no specific evidence of an identifiable forensic disadvantage to the accused. The provisions inserted in the Evidence Act should distinguish between these two situations by stipulating first, that where there has been a significant delay between the time at which an offence is alleged to have occurred and the reporting of that offence and a party requests that a warning in Longman terms be given, a warning may only be given where specific evidence is identified that the accused has suffered an identifiable forensic disadvantage as a result of the delay. This provision should also stipulate that forensic disadvantage is not established by the mere fact of delay alone and that a trial judge may refuse to give the warning if there are good reasons for doing so. Second, the provisions should then provide that where specific evidence of an identifiable forensic disadvantage resulting from delay is not identified and a party requests that a warning concerning delay be given, the trial judge may explain to the jury what the implications of the delay in complaint are for the accused. In such a case the explanation should not be couched as a warning and in neither case should a warning or explanation be given in the particular terms laid down by the High Court in Longman, Crampton and Doggett. Any warning given should be in accordance with s 165(2). This last recommendation is consistent with the recommendation that s 165(5) be abolished, the aim being to bring all warnings within the umbrella of the procedure in s 164(1)-(4).

3.3.14 This reform proposal resembles the current law in place in England and Wales for cases of delayed complaint in childhood sexual abuse prosecutions. In a recent comparative examination of forensic disadvantage directions in delayed prosecutions of childhood sexual abuse, Penney Lewis outlined the development of a 'new jurisprudence' by English courts in which 'the need for a warning is triggered not by an assumption of forensic disadvantage... but by a showing of prejudice by the defendant as a result of the delay.'¹⁰³ Lewis is critical of the current Australian approach, based on Longman, Crampton and Doggett. She argues that it '...presumes forensic disadvantage or prejudice in all cases of delay and requires that the jury be warned of it, [and] does not take account of the possibility that forensic disadvantage may not occur in all cases.’¹⁰⁴ The Longman warning is too broad and wide-ranging. As Lewis points out, in its current form it ‘goes further than is necessary to ensure a fair trial in cases where there is no evidence of forensic disadvantage.’¹⁰⁵ It has the potential to mislead the jury and as Mr Ellis SC observed in his submission, it requires the trial judge to usurp the fact-finding role of the jury.

¹⁰¹ Ibid. See Recommendation 18-3. Appendix 1 of ALRC 102 contains a draft provision reflecting the intent of Recommendation 18-3.

¹⁰² Ibid. See 18.130- 18.146.

¹⁰³ P Lewis, 'A comparative examination of forensic disadvantage directions in delayed prosecutions of childhood sexual abuse' (2005) 29 Crim LJ 281, 282.

3.3.15 The proposed approach recommended by the Institute will not assault the principles of a fair trial or the defendant’s entitlement to be presumed innocent. Fair trials continue to take place in England and Wales and as the English cases confirm, the practice of the accused submitting evidence of forensic disadvantage as a result of delayed complaint has had no effect on eroding the presumption of innocence accorded to the accused. As the English Court of Appeal recognised in Percival,¹⁰⁶ the defendant’s ultimate protection in such cases remains the burden and standard of proof.

3.3.16 The Institute also proposes that the use of the ‘dangerous or unsafe to convict’ formulation should be proscribed expressly in legislation. This form of direction has been the subject of judicial and academic criticism¹⁰⁷ and ought to be replaced by the language of caution, as it is far more appropriate and less likely to confuse. An express prohibition (an approach agreed to by the ALRC and VLRC in the report on Uniform Evidence Law¹⁰⁸) will require trial judges to cease employing the dangerous to convict formulation in the context of Longman. An example of such a prohibition with respect to warnings about children’s evidence is illustrated by section 165A of the Evidence Act 1995 (NSW). It says:

- (1) A judge in any proceeding in which evidence is given by a child must not warn a jury, or make any suggestion to a jury, that children as a class are unreliable witnesses.
- (2) Without limiting subsection (1), that subsection prohibits a general warning to a jury of the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of any child witness.

Forensic Disadvantage

3.3.17 The Institute’s proposals intend to introduce an evidential rather than a legal burden on the accused when a Longman warning is in question. Imposing an onus of proof on the accused is not unusual in procedural law. For example, the accused bears an onus of proof on the balance of probabilities where he or she seeks to motivate the discretionary exclusion of evidence under ss 90, 138 and 137 of the Evidence Act 2001 (Tas). Similarly, an accused may bear an onus of proof on preliminary questions under s 189 of the Act. However, it is not recommended that a burden of proof on the balance of probabilities be imposed upon an accused seeking a warning in relation to forensic disadvantage resulting from delayed complaint. Nevertheless, to justify the giving of a warning the accused should be required to discharge the evidential burden of identifying specific evidence adduced at trial that shows an identifiable forensic disadvantage that s/he has suffered as a result of the delay, (for example, where a potential alibi witness has died or is too ill to testify). This requirement will achieve the displacement of the common law irrebuttable presumption of disadvantage and help eliminate the ritualistic giving of Longman warnings regardless of the particular facts of the case.

3.3.18 The Law Council stated in its submission to the ALRC review of the uniform Evidence Acts that ‘[t]he effect of this [placing an onus on the accused in relation to the Longman warning], is to place the onus on the accused to establish that as a result of the direction in question the accused has lost a chance of acquittal.’¹⁰⁹ As some of the submissions to the Issues Paper pointed out, in most cases of substantial delay in making a complaint the forensic disadvantage to the accused is plain and ¹⁰⁴ Ibid, 295.

¹⁰⁵ Ibid, 293.

¹⁰⁶ R v Percival (1998) 142 SJLB 190 quoted in P Lewis, ibid, 294.

¹⁰⁷ See P Lewis, above n 103, 294.

¹⁰⁸ ALRC, NSWLRC and VLRC, above n 89, 18.124.

¹⁰⁹ Law Council of Australia submission to review of the Uniform Evidence Acts quoted in ALRC, NSWLRC and VLRC, above n 85, 16.108.

obvious. Forensic disadvantage resulting from delay can take a variety of forms. Due to the passage of time witnesses, real evidence, documentary or physical evidence may be unavailable. As Michael Daly from the Tasmanian Independent Bar stated:

It is axiomatic that justice delayed is justice denied. Witnesses' and accused persons' memories fade. Evidence is lost or destroyed. Witnesses and accused are obviously unable to remember what may have been forgotten.

3.3.19 However, as the ALRC and VLRC point out in their report on Uniform Evidence Law,¹¹⁰ the general or nebulous disadvantage that an accused might suffer need not in most cases be the subject of a judicial warning, as this is an issue that can be raised by counsel in address. It is not necessary that it be underscored by the trial judge. The prosecution will have also suffered a general disadvantage due to the delay, which impacts on the ability to satisfy the burden of proof. ...the judge should not give a warning simply because there has been a delay which gives rise to hypothetical disadvantage.

3.3.20 Like the delay which was at issue in Longman, where the delay is of considerable length, the accused will often face an identifiable significant forensic disadvantage. It is not too heavy an evidential onus for the accused to identify from the evidence adduced at trial that he or she is suffering some specific disadvantage because of the delay. Moreover, as the English jurisprudence indicates, this evidential onus does not erode the accused's right to be presumed innocent nor the prosecution's burden of proof.

Conclusion

3.3.21 The recommended changes to the Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) are unlikely to have an effect on the majority of cases where the accused is likely to be prejudiced because of the delay in complaint. Warnings will continue to be given in such cases appropriate to the particular circumstances of the case. The changes recommended by the Institute are not intended to prohibit warnings being given about the disadvantage suffered by an accused as a result of delayed complaint. Rather, they aim to clarify what is to be said and when, to prevent the Longman warning from being given in a ritualistic manner in all cases of delay and to reduce the potential for successful appeals based on judicial error arising from whether the warning ought to have been given.

3.3.22 The Institute considers the proposed changes to the legislation, which are consistent with those recommended by the ALRC and the VLRC, are measured responses to the difficulties inherent in the Longman warning as it now stands. The changes will continue to allow warnings to be given where, on the basis of the evidence, the delay in complaint has disadvantaged the accused, but will stop the warning from being given where, on the basis of the evidence, it is unnecessary and stigmatises the complainant's account in an unwarranted manner.

¹¹⁰ ALRC, NSWLRC and VLRC, above n 89, 18.122.

Recommendation 2:

The Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) should be amended to include provisions dealing with warnings and explanations in relation to forensic disadvantage incurred by an accused due to delay in the reporting of an offence. These provisions should:

- require that where there has been a significant delay between the time at which an offence is alleged to have occurred and the reporting of that offence, and the accused requests that a warning be given, a warning may only be given where specific evidence is identified that demonstrates that s/he has suffered an identifiable forensic disadvantage as a result of the delay;
- stipulate that identifiable forensic disadvantage is not established by the mere fact of delay alone;
- make it clear that any warning given is to be given in accordance with s 165(2) and that it must not be couched in the particular terms laid down by the High Court in Longman, Crampton and Doggett;
- specify that the warning is not to be couched in terms of its being ‘dangerous or unsafe to convict’;
- also provide that where no specific evidence of an identifiable forensic disadvantage resulting from delay is identified and the accused requests that a warning be given, the trial judge may explain to the jury what the implications of the delay in complaint are for the accused;
- make it clear that any such explanation is not to be couched as a warning in Longman terms, including not being couched in terms of its being ‘dangerous or unsafe to convict’; and
- stipulate that the trial judge may refuse to give a warning or explanation if there are good reasons for doing so.

3.4 Crofts Warning

3.4.1 The Victorian Law Reform Commission has recommended amendment of s 61 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic), (the Victorian equivalent of s 371A Criminal Code (Tas)), to restrict the Crofts warning to cases where there is evidence to show that delay in complaint actually does have implications for the complainant’s credibility:¹¹¹

Section 61 of the Crimes Act 1958 should be amended as follows [proposed amendments in italics, existing provisions in normal text]:

- (1) On a trial of a person for an offence under Crimes Act 1958 Part 1, Division (8A), (8b), (8c), (8D) or (8E) ...

¹¹¹ VLRC, above n 72, 7.133.

Part 3: Options for Reform

- (a) The Judge must not warn, or suggest in any way to, the jury that the law regards complainants in sexual offences cases as an unreliable class of witness: and
- (b) (i) If evidence is given or a question is asked of a witness or a statement is made in the course of an address on evidence which tends to suggest that there is delay in making a complaint about the alleged offence by the person against whom the offence is alleged to have been committed, the judge must inform the jury that there may be good reasons why a victim of a sexual assault may delay or hesitate in complaining about it.

(ii) The judge must not state, or suggest in any way to the jury that the credibility of a complainant is affected by delay in reporting a sexual assault unless satisfied that there exists sufficient evidence in the particular case to justify such a warning.

...

- (2) Subject to s 61(1)(b)(ii), (c), (d) and (e), nothing in subsection (1) prevents a judge from making any comment on evidence given in the proceeding that it is appropriate to make in the interests of justice.
- (3) Despite subsection (2), a judge must not make any comment on the reliability of evidence given by the complainant in a proceeding to which subsection (1) applies if there is no reason to do so in the particular proceeding in order to ensure a fair trial.

3.4.2 It is questionable whether this provision will displace Crofts. The decision in that case was premised upon the assumption that the balancing direction it mandates is necessitated by the particular circumstances of the instant case, not by considerations at large. It may be that the Victorian amendments could be interpreted as simply enacting Crofts because they make provision for the trial judge to warn where he or she is ‘satisfied that there exists sufficient evidence in the particular case to justify such a warning.’ The facts in Crofts itself, as viewed by the High Court, arguably satisfy this condition.

3.4.3 In Queensland, the decision in Crofts has been overridden by s 4A(4) Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld). This provides:

If a defendant is tried by a jury, the judge must not warn or suggest in any way to the jury that the law regards the complainant’s evidence to be more reliable or less reliable only because of the length of time before the complainant made a preliminary complaint or other complaint.

A ‘preliminary complaint’ is defined as a complaint other than the complainant’s first formal witness statement to a police officer given in, or in anticipation of criminal proceedings or a complaint made after such a complaint.

3.4.4 The effect of section 4A(4) has not to date received significant judicial interpretation. Consequently, it is not known whether it precludes a trial judge from making any comment at all on the issue of delayed complaint. The legislation does not prevent the defence from attempting to undermine the credibility of the complainant’s account by cross-examining her or him about delayed complaint or by addressing the jury in these terms. Where this occurs, the question will be whether s 4A(4) Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) prevents a trial judge from making any comments on this tactic and the assumptions that underlie it. Section 4A(5) provides that, subject to subsection (4), the judge may make any comment to a jury on the complainant’s evidence that it is appropriate to make in the interests of justice.

3.4.5 Section 4A(4) appears to be stronger than the reform recommended by the Victorian Law Reform Commission because it does not contain any ‘let out’ clause along the lines of the Victorian model. The major weakness of the Queensland legislation is that it does not require the trial judge give any counterintuitive directions to the jury about the implications of delayed complaint for the trustworthiness of the complainant's account where the defence has made this an issue in the case.

3.4.6 Given the research findings that delay in or failure to make complaint is normal, is in fact the rule rather than the exception and is what happens in the vast majority of sexual assault cases, logically the Crofts warning rests on a faulty premise and asks the jury to judge the credibility of complainants according to flawed reasoning. Therefore, it is suggested that s 371A of the Code should be amended to reflect this fact and to preclude the trial judge from suggesting or warning that absence of proximate complaint may reflect on the creditworthiness of the complainant's account.

Submissions

3.4.7 The respondents to the issues paper did not offer extensive feedback on the problems presented by the Crofts direction or the preferred reform options.

3.4.8 On the one hand, there was some support for the reform of s 371A of the Tasmanian Criminal Code as the Institute has detailed above, but the imprecise nature of a formulation like 'exceptional circumstances' was referred to as a concern. On the other hand, the proposals presented in the issues paper regarding the Crofts warning were viewed as placing more evidentiary hurdles (before the defendant), and that this, according to Mr Ellis SC, the Director of Public Prosecutions, 'might undesirably restrict fair argument or comment on issues arising from the evidence'.

3.4.9 There was limited support for the Queensland formulation expressed in s 4A(4) of the Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld). This provision has the intention of overriding Crofts, but the practical effect of the formulation is still somewhat uncertain.

Recommendations

3.4.10 In sexual offence cases in Tasmania involving delayed complaint, the present law requires that the judge give two apparently contradictory warnings to the jury. On the one hand, s 371A of the Criminal Code (Tas) requires a warning that delayed complaint does not indicate that the complainant had fabricated the allegations.¹¹² On the other, under the common law, the Crofts doctrine requires a further direction to the jury that such delay may be indicative of fabrication. Adding further to the confusion, under the common law, the judicial obligation to give the direction exists even when it is not requested. Moreover, it is not even clear when the Crofts direction is required.

3.4.11 In a study conducted by the VLRC of 11 judges giving a jury the Crofts warning, only two cases involved a delay in complaint.¹¹³ Nine cases featured a Crofts warning even though such a warning was not necessary. The VLRC goes on to note that the provision of such a warning may lead to jury overload and confusion when a warning on delay is not supported by the facts of the case.

3.4.12 The inconsistency embodied by the direction required by s 371A (that there may be good reasons why a person may hesitate in making a complaint) and the Crofts warning (that delay in complaint may reflect on the complainant's credibility) is clearly an unsatisfactory state of affairs. The New South Wales Standing Committee on Law and Justice has commented that the 'unavoidable result' of the Crofts warning is the revival of the 'stereotypical view that delay is invariably a sign of the falsity of the complaint.'¹¹⁴

¹¹² Legislation enacted in other jurisdictions with similar intent to s 371A are the: Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 61(1)(b); Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) s 294; Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Act 1978 (Qld) s 4A(4); and Evidence Act 1906 (WA) s 36BD.

¹¹³ VLRC, above n 72, p. 366.

¹¹⁴ Standing Committee on Law and Justice, Legislative Council, New South Wales Parliament, Report on Child Sexual Assault Prosecutions, Report No. 22 (2002), 4.174.

Views of the Australian, New South Wales and Victorian Law Reform Commissions

3.4.13 As in the case of the Longman warning, in ALRC DP 69 the Law Reform Commissions undertaking the review sought feedback on the Institute's proposals (as well as the VLRC's recommendations) in relation to the Crofts direction. The final report on Uniform Evidence Law delivered by the Australian, New South Wales and Victorian Law Reform Commissions recognises that the Crofts warning is,¹¹⁵ highly problematic as it reflects assumptions about sexual assault complainants which are outdated and empirically unsustainable. The research . . . demonstrates that there is no logical nexus between delay in complaint and the credibility of the complainant, and hence there is no foundation for such a warning to be given.

The Commissions' view, however, is that the problems inherent in the Crofts warning 'should be dealt with in offence-specific legislation',¹¹⁶ like the Criminal Code, rather than in the uniform evidence law.

3.4.14 As the final report on the uniform Evidence Law points out, there was some support for the Institute's proposals from the submissions received and the consultations undertaken by the Commissions.¹¹⁷ However, after considering the range of submission and consultations in the Commissions' final report and re-considering the range of criticisms of the Crofts direction, the Institute has revised the initial proposal it presented in its Issues Paper.¹¹⁸

Views of the Institute

3.4.15 The Institute is now of the view that the Criminal Code should be amended so as to prohibit entirely trial judges giving the Crofts warning. This revised proposal is in line with the view of the New South Wales Legislative Council Standing Committee on Law and Justice.¹¹⁹ As the Institute has already pointed out, delay in or failure to make complaint is typical in sexual assault cases. Furthermore, as is stated in the final report on Uniform Evidence Law, 'there is nothing inherent in delay that makes it likely that the complainant is being untruthful.'¹²⁰ That is, delay in complaint has no relevance to the credibility of the complainant. The Crofts warning as it stands currently has the effect of suggesting that delay in complaint is probative of innocence. It undermines thoroughly s 371A of the Code and tips the balance too far in favour of the accused,¹²¹ thereby compromising a fair trial. The warning constitutes bad law and accordingly ought to be abolished.

3.4.16 While not calling for its prohibition expressly, the Australian, New South Wales and Victorian Law Reform Commissions suggest that the Crofts direction should no longer be given by trial judges:¹²²

...in an oath against oath trial, as sexual assault cases almost invariably are, the credibility and reliability of the complainant's evidence is likely to be one of the central issues. Given that this is the case, it is questionable whether there is any need for the judge to give a warning or make a comment in relation to the credibility of the complainant. In cases where there is evidence to support the suggestion that the delay in complaint bears some relation to the credibility of the complainant, such matters should be the subject of counsel's address, rather than the subject of a judicial warning.

¹¹⁵ ALRC, NSWLRC and VLRC, above n 89, 18.169.

¹¹⁶ Ibid, 18.172.

¹¹⁷ Ibid, 18.165-66.

¹¹⁸ Tasmanian Law Reform Institute, Warnings in Sexual Offences Cases relating to Delay in Complaint, Issues Paper No. 8, June 2005, [3.1.12], available at: <http://www.law.utas.edu.au/reform/>

¹¹⁹ Ibid, 18.161.

¹²⁰ Ibid, 18.170.

¹²¹ VLRC, above n 72, 368.

¹²² Ibid, 18.171.

3.4.17 The Crofts warning is one that research shows to be based on an entirely faulty premise. Furthermore, the direction has been criticised because:

- giving the warning in cases where there is no positive link between delay and credibility effectively reinstates the traditional stereotypes that sexual assault complainants are unreliable and prone to fabrication;
- the warning essentially negates the protective effects and legislative intent behind section 371A of the Code; and
- the giving of two contradictory warnings (the direction required by s 371A that there may be good reasons why a person may hesitate in making a complaint and the Crofts warning that delay in complaint may reflect on the complainant's credibility) renders both warnings redundant and risks confusing the jury.

Accordingly, the Criminal Code ought to be amended by introducing a new provision that prohibits trial judges from giving a Crofts direction.

Recommendation 3:

The Criminal Code (Tas) should be amended to include a provision that prohibits expressly trial judges from giving a Crofts direction.